A BRIEF description of these twelve numbers of a favourite publication must suffice. The first two are by J. Varley Roberts, of Magdalen College, Oxford. Both are suitable for general use, the first, "God so loved the world," being a full anthem expressively written in the manner of the late Sir John Goss. The other, "The Lord shall be thy confidence," is for trio (the treble being omitted in the middle verse section), and is rather more elaborate, the last movement being an effective fugato chorus. No. 475, "All Thy works praise Thee," by Sir Joseph Barnby, is a spirited Festival anthem, which a capable choir could make very effective. No. 476, "Thou shalt show me the path of life," by Cyril Bowdler, is an ambitious little work, for although the writing is not elaborate, there are parts for solo voices and chorus in which the treatment, especially in respect of harmonic transitions, is very striking. S. S. Wesley's "The Lord hath been mindful" (No. 477) needs no commendation from any pen. The composer was one of the ornaments of the English Church, and the present chorus, taken from the anthem "Ascribe unto the Lord," contains some excellent contrapuntal writing, though it cannot be termed difficult. No. 478, "A few more years shall roll," by Hugh Blair, is for Advent or general use, and is simple and hymnlike in structure. Boyce's "O praise our God" (No. 479) is the final chorus with fugal treatment from an elaborate anthem, "O be joyful in God," by a musician who was one of the most worthy successors of the masters of English church music. Harvest-tide is yet distant, but it is not too distant to draw attention to "Thou visitest the earth," by Sir Joseph Barnby (No. 480). This begins melodiously, but quietly, and is followed by a middle section for semi-chorus of a more animated character, in which occur some effective contrapuntal passages. An impressive setting of the words "O Lord, Thou art my God," precedes a final jubilant chorus of great vigour, which, however, finishes pianissimo. No. 481, "Great is the Lord," by Bruce Steane, is also for harvest, or other thanksgiving services. It is very simple, and solo voices are not imperative. Nos. 482 and 483 are likewise harvest anthems, the former being "The eyes of all wait upon Thee," by Thomas Adams, and the latter, "The Lord is loving unto every man," by A. Wellesley Batson. The composition by Mr. Adams, though brief, shows a greater measure than usual of musical feeling, and gives the impression that the composer might be successful in works of larger grade. The last-named number is an extremely simple full anthem well within the means of parish choirs. The last for the present is "Thou wilt keep him in perfect peace," by Philip Armes. This is No. 7 of an Oratorio, "Hezekiah," and consists of a smoothly written chorus with flowing accompaniment. It is quite in the oratorio style, but it makes an agreeable and devotional little anthem suitable for general use.

On Respiration in Singing. By Dr. Joal, of Mont Dore. Translated and edited by R. Norris Wolfenden, M.D., Cantab.; late Senior Physician to the Hospital for Diseases of the Throat, Golden Square. [F. J. Rebman.]

ALL vocalists and teachers of singing who have any doubts concerning the most efficacious method of respiration may be earnestly recommended to read this carefully prepared and well thought out little book. The three systems—abdominal, clavicular, and costal—are clearly described, the resultant effects calmly and judiciously stated, and with an array of facts that leaves no doubt in the unprejudiced mind concerning the superior advantages accruing from employment of the system advocated. The treatise is of special value to female vocalists, to whom much of the information is of vital importance, for it affects their general health as well as their artistic progress. When it is remembered how many singers fail in their art owing to imperfect breathing, it must be conceded that Dr. Wolfenden has done a commendable work in placing Dr. Joal's book in the hands of English vocalists.

The Orchestra at a Glance. A condensed work on Instrumentation. By E. A. Lodge.

[Huddersfield: E. A. Lodge.]

THIS consists of a chart showing the pitch and compass of the majority of orchestral instruments, with concise and explanatory remarks having reference to their capabilities and tone-colour. The information as far as it goes is reliable, but from the form adopted it is necessarily limited. No mention is made of the corno di bassetto, written for by Mozart in his "Requiem" and elsewhere, and which bears the same relation to the C clarinet as the cor anglais does to the oboe. The bass clarinet, frequently used by Wagner, is also omitted; and ventral horns and the bass tubas are altogether ignored. The chart is therefore far from containing "all orchestral instruments," as it claims to do; but it is to be welcomed as helpful to students and conducive to the appreciation and enjoyment of orchestral music.

Four Lyrics. No. 1. Irish Lullaby (Francis A. Fahy); 2. Lorna Doone's Song (R. D. Blackmore); 3. Oh mistress mine (Shakespeare); 4. Pastheen Pion (Sir Samuel Ferguson). Set to music by Alicia Adélaide Needham.

In Blossom Time. Words by Ina D. Coolbrith, music by Alicia Adélaide Needham.

[Novello, Ewer and Co.]

THESE songs, by a composer whose name is new to us, possess considerable freshness and charm, and a laudable desire to avoid the commonplace is displayed both in the choice of the poems and their musical setting. Of the Four Lyrics, No. 1 is perhaps the best, for it is provided with an eminently singable and tuneful melody and a haunting refrain; No. 2 is an expressive song which would gain by a somewhat lighter accompaniment; No. 3, a merry and spirited setting of the immortal ditty, has a tripping accompaniment, presenting some agreeable features; while No. 4, which occupies ten pages, will prove effective if the composer's suggestion of a cut of two pages is followed. It is an Irish love-song about a "brown girl, sweet," and is appropriately charged with genuine Irish sentiment. "In blossom time" is a joyous, jubilant song, with an important and brilliant accompaniment, which greatly enhances its effectiveness.

Six Simple Pieces for the Violin. By Therese Polonaski. [Robert Cocks and Co.]

THE contents of this little volume are exactly described by its title, and it is admirably suited to beginners, for whom it has been specially written.

The Parish Choir Book, Nos. 186-198.

[Novello, Ewer and Co.]

THE merits of Mr. Stewart Macpherson to recognition as a musician and composer are freely acknowledged, and his reputation will not suffer by the Magnificat and Nunc dimittis in D which forms the first number of the present series. It is studiously unpretentious, the voice parts being indeed in unison during many verses; but there are many artistic touches, and the manner is throughout church-like. No. 187 is another setting of the same Canticles, in G, by Frank L. Moir, written in simple four-part harmony throughout, the most impressive passage being the Coda of the Gloria Patri. No. 188 is a Te Deum and Benedictus in E flat, by Boyton Smith, written in chant form, with the most careful attention to the proper accentuation of the words. The next two numbers are more settings of the Magnificat and Nunc dimittis. The first, in D, by Clement Rowland Gale, is extremely effective, and even impassioned, but not in the least unchurchlike. The composer is evidently well acquainted with modern sacred music. The second, in B flat, bears the name of Henry Smart, and therefore belongs to the past; but it is none the worse on that account. The setting, with which many organists and choirmasters are doubtless familiar, is laid out on an elaborate scale, and is eminently suitable for festival purposes. The other evening Canticles, Cantate Domino and Deus Misereatur, are not so frequently used as formerly, but they are still sung at times, and a fine version in C, by Charles Steggall (No. 191), may be strongly recommended, as it is in the best style of English church music. We now come to No. 192, "Father of Life," a wedding hymn with an expressive tune by James Turle, and No. 193, a Sunday hymn, "Lord of all being," with melodious and varied music by A. M. Goodhart. No. 194 is yet another Magnificat and Nunc dimittis, the composer being William H. Bell. It is written in a bold, free style, and should prove very effective if sung with the requisite spirit. The next two numbers (195 and 196) are chant settings of the Benedicite in the usual triple chant measure, the first, in D, by Sir John Stainer, and the second, in A flat, by F. A. J. Hervey. Both are varied in accordance with the sentiment of the words, but no words of criticism are necessary regarding music of such complete simplicity. The last two for the present (197 and 198) are settings of the Apostles' Creed, the Lord's Prayer, and the Nicene Creed, by Professor J. F. Bridge. They are simply organ accompaniments to the choir on the monotone of G, a method now very generally adopted. Organists who have the gift of extemporisation can of course dispense with written notes for this kind of duty, but there are many excellent musicians who do not possess this faculty, and to such Professor Bridge's harmonies will prove useful.

Novello's School Songs. Edited by W. G. McNaught. The Wasp. Words by Edward Oxenford, music by Thomas Facer. Merry Archers. Words by W. H. Parker, music by A. L. Cowley. The Statue Song. Words by Louis B. Tisdale, music by Herbert W. Schartau.

[Novello, Ewer and Co.]

THESE little works for juvenile performers are so-called action songs, in which music and dramatic business are combined. They are issued in full music size, and the voice parts are printed in the Staff and the Tonic Sol-fa notations. In Mr. Facer's work some of the children are instructed, among other things, to imitate the buzzing of wasps. This piece is as tuneful and simple as possible, but that of Mr. Cowley is rather more elaborate, being written for voices in two parts with tasteful pianoforte accompaniments. In the last of the series the little choristers have to adopt poses suggestive in turn of Ajax, Supplication, the Victor, the Diver, and Achilles. School music is now in such strong demand that no more need be said in favour of the above-named songs.

Le Rève. Trio for violin, violoncello, and pianoforte. By Francis Thomé (Op. 55). [Paris: J. Hamelle.]

THIS is an ingenious little piece, written in canon two in one. It is both easy and interesting to play, and possesses a graceful charm that suggests a dream of a tranquil and eminently pleasant character.

FOREIGN NOTES.

AMSTERDAM.—A one-act lyrical drama, entitled "Sele-neia," by M. van Brucken Fock, was brought out recently at the Netherlandish Opera, where it achieved a complete success. The composer, who conducted the performance, is an officer in the Dutch army.

BARCELONA.—A series of five Historical Concerts, one of them devoted entirely to Beethoven, was given here with much success during the past month, under the auspices of the Sociedad Catalana de Conciertos, and under the conductorship, by invitation, of M. Vincent d'Indy. The event is the more noteworthy on account of the not very advanced condition of high-class musical culture in this city.—A new opera, "Henry Clifford," by Señor Albeniz, the well-known pianist, is being rehearsed at the Teatro del Liceo.

BAYREUTH.—It is stated on good authority that Dr. von Müller, the Bavarian Minister of Public Culture, has been in communication with Frau Cosima Wagner, with a view of obtaining the right of performance of "Parsifal" for the Munich Hof-Theater, the minister offering in return the co-operation of the Munich orchestra and chorus in the Bayreuth Festspiele. Frau Wagner, however, to the contentment, no doubt, of numberless admirers of the work, has declined the offer.

BERLIN.—A commemorative tablet has been placed against the house in the Königgrätzer-Strasse, where Wilhelm Taubert for many years resided. Herr Leopold Auer, the eminent violinist, has given some highly interesting and successful concerts here, in which he introduced a number of Tchaikowsky's works, both orchestral and for the chamber—himself playing, to an enthusiastic audience, the Russian master's Violin Concerto. Herr Auer has since repeated his success, with similar programmes, at Dresden and other German musical centres. — The first performance, at the Royal Opera, of a new operatic work by Herr Kienzl, entitled "Der Evangelimann," was announced to take place towards the end of last month.—On the 8th ult. the Wagner Society performed "The Messiah," under the conductorship of Court Capellmeister Sucher. It was in every way successful and had to be repeated a few days later, at popular prices.

BREMEN.—Active preparations have been in progress for some months past with a view to the first scenic representation of Rubinstein's sacred opera "Christus," which was to take place on the 25th inst., at the Stadt-Theater. The scenic arrangements are under the management of Professor Bülthaupt, while the musical directors will be Dr. Carl Muck, of the Berlin Opera, and Herr Julius Rurthard, of the Bremen Stadt-Theater. The leading parts are in the hands of highly competent artists, and the chorus, of some 350 voices, has been selected from among local amateurs.

BRESLAU.—A one-act opera, "Schön Karin," by a young Danish composer, Fräulein Thekla Griebel, recently brought out at the Stadt-Theater, has been received with much disfavour on the part of a usually indulgent audience.

BRUSSELS.—Under the style of "Art-Charité," a ladies' choir has been organised here, under the conductorship of M. Henri Thiébaud, with the twofold object of producing new works by native composers and of promoting concert performances for charitable purposes; a combination which should command the special support of art lovers in this capital.—The performances at the Théâtre de la Monnaie were concluded last month with a revival of "Der Freischütz," which had not been given here for fifteen years.—At the Conservatoire, three remarkable performances, in concert form, have been given of Wagner's "Das Rheingold," under direction of M. Gevaert.

COPENHAGEN.—Enna's opera "Cleopatra," which failed to attract much attention on its first performance here last year, has just been revived, with a new cast of the principal parts, and in this new presentation has scored a success.

DARMSTADT.—On the occasion of a "Humperdinck Night" recently given by the Wagner-Verein here, much interest was created by the performance, from manuscript, of a number of choruses and solos from a new fairy opera, "Schneewittchen" (Little Snowwhite), by the composer of "Hänsel und Gretel," who was present. The libretto is from the pen of Fräulein Adelheid Wette, who also wrote the book of "Hänsel und Gretel," and the musical treatment thereof was generally pronounced by those present to be fully equal to the score of that most popular work.

DRESDEN.—Under the style of "Philharmonic Choir," a new choral society has just been founded which is likely to prove an important addition to the musical institutions in this capital. The Conductor is Herr Curt Hösel, and the first work to be performed by the young choir is Liszt's "Saint Elizabeth," no insignificant task to commence upon.

FRANKFORT-ON-MAINE.—Herr Anton Urspruch, professor of the Conservatorium, has just completed the score of a comic opera bearing the somewhat awkward title of "Das Unmöglichste von Allem." The libretto is an adaptation, by the composer himself, of a comedy by Lope de Vega.

HAMBURG.—An opera, "Der Wärfwolf," by Count von Hochberg, the director of the Berlin Royal Opera, has been brought out at the Stadt-Theater with marked success. The work is not exactly a novelty, having been performed before a specially invited audience some nineteen years ago in the German capital.—A magnificent Concert-grand has been presented by Steinway and Sons, through their branch establishment here, to Prince Bismarck, on the occasion of his recently completed eightieth anniversary.

HANOVER.—The birth-centenary of Heinrich Marschner, which occurs in August next, is to be celebrated here, as elsewhere in the fatherland, by special performances.

LEIPZIG.—Dr. F. Stade, one of the most highly esteemed musicians of this town, has been appointed the successor to the late Herr Stiller in the organistship of St. Peter's Church, Leipzig.—During last month the old Leipzig Gewandhaus, which contained the historical Concert-Saal, has been razed to the ground, and with it has also disappeared the adjacent building, which had been the home, from its foundation in 1843 to the year 1887, of the world-famed Conservatorium der Musik.—Tschaiowsky's one-act opera "Yolante" was given here last month at the Stadt-Theater with but moderate success.

MADRID.—Under the title of "Tabardillo," a new one-act Zarzuela, the music by Señor Torregrosa, is being performed with much success at the Apollo Theatre in this capital.—A new three-act opera, "La Dolores," the libretto adapted from the well known drama of that name by Felin y Codina, the music by Señor Tomas Breton, has been brought out with great success at the Teatro de la Zarzuela.—The most popular composer of Zarzuelas just now is Señor Ruperto Chapi, whose "El Cura del Regimiento" and "El Tambour de Grenaderos" are having a run already exceeding 160 performances at the Teatro Eslava.

MAYENCE.—A new music-drama, entitled "Der arme Heinrich," by Herr Hans Pfitzner, was brought out here, on the 2nd ult., with marked success. The composer, a young musician with decided Wagnerian leanings, though by no means devoid of originality, is said to have shown great dramatic verve and surprising skill in the orchestration of his score.

MILAN.—Mascagni's new opera, "Silvano," was brought out at La Scala on March 25, but failed to meet with much appreciation. The libretto is constructed upon somewhat similar lines to that of "Cavalleria," and the score, while not wanting in melodiousness, is said to be rather weak in its orchestration.

MUNICH.—With the first performance some weeks since, under the direction of Herr Levi, of Berlioz's "La Prise de Troie," the Munich Royal Opera has become the second operatic stage which has had the hardihood to produce the French master's gigantic music-drama "Les Troyens"; the other constituent part—viz., "Les Troyens à Carthage," having been given here in January last.

NANTES.—M. Bédérin, a former pupil of the Paris École Niedermeyer, has been appointed organist of the Cathedral here. Like the Bachs in the last century, the Bédérins are a family of organists, and the distinguished post at the Cathedral has been held by one or other of their members for the last eighty years.

PESARO.—A hitherto quite unknown cantata by Rossini, the subject of which is the Francesca da Rimini episode in Dante's "Inferno," has been brought to light at the Rossini Museum in this town. A highly successful performance of the work was recently given by the pupils of the Conservatoire here.

ROME.—Siegfried Wagner paid his first professional visit to the Italian capital at the beginning of last month, and conducted a number of the Bayreuth master's works at a Concert given at the Costanzi Theatre, in the presence of Queen Margherita.—Dr. Joachim is expected to give a Concert here shortly, for the first time in his artistic career, and the event is looked forward to with immense interest in musical circles. The eminent violinist will be accompanied by the young violoncellist, Herr Henselt, a nephew of Mendelssohn.

ST. PETERSBURG.—The series of Madame Marcella Sembrich's appearances at the Italian Opera here came to a highly successful termination with her assumption of the part of Tamara in Rubinstein's "Il Demonio."—The emperor has granted an annual pension of three thousand roubles to Rubinstein's widow.—Signor Leoncavallo's opera "Chatterton" is shortly to be produced at the Italian Opera here, under the direction of its composer.

STRASSBURG.—The Committee of the Industrial Exhibition, to be opened here this month, have had the excellent idea of arranging for a series of Orchestral Concerts to be given in connection with the undertaking by well-known orchestral bodies—viz., two performances each by the Berlin Philharmonic Society, conducted by Herr Mannstaedt; by the Milanese Società orchestrale della Scala, under the direction of Signor Ferrari; and by M. Colonne's Paris orchestra. The first of these Concerts is announced to take place on the 21st inst.

TOULOUSE.—The first performance in France of César Franck's posthumous opera "Hulda" (brought out last year at Monte Carlo) took place at the Théâtre du Capitole, on the 8th ult., under direction of M. Armand Raynaud, and met with an enthusiastic reception.

TURIN.—The Stefano Tempia Society gave an interesting performance recently of the "Hymn to Apollo," discovered some two years since by M. Homolle, of Athens. An accompaniment, written for flutes, bassoons, and harp, had been supplied for the occasion by Signor Foschini, a professor of the Liceo Musicale of Turin.

VIENNA.—A parody of Humperdinck's, "Hänsel und Gretel" is drawing full houses at the Volks-Theater just now. The composer, under the pseudonym of "Plum-pudding," is Herr Roth, Herren Costa and Heinrich being the authors of the really funny libretto.—A new operetta, "Die Karlsschülerin," has met with great success at the Theater an der Wien. The music is from the pen of Herr Carl Weinberger, one of the most talented amongst the younger generation of Viennese operetta writers.—Smetana's three-act opera, entitled, in the German version by Herr Kalbeck, "Das Geheimniss" (The Secret), was brought out recently at the Imperial Opera, under Herr Jahn's direction, and was well received. The work was first produced in 1878, at Prague, in the Czech language.

WEIMAR.—Herr Eugen d'Albert has been appointed to the first Capellmeistership at the Hof-Theater, in succession to Herr Ed. Lassen. The pianist-composer will assume his new functions at once with the rehearsal of a new and already much talked of operatic work by Herr Max Schillings, entitled "Ingwelde."

THE Leeds Musical Festival will take place on October 2, 3, 4, and 5, under the direction of Sir Arthur Sullivan. The guarantee fund now amounts to £26,480. Only those who become guarantors have the privilege of first choice of seats by ballot. As there is a reserve fund of over £3,000, it will be evident that any guarantee is but nominal.

A MEETING of the Academical Council of the Guild of Violinists was held at the offices of the Guild, Gray's Inn Road, on the 11th ult., Mr. J. T. Carrodus, the Warden, in the chair. It was decided that two more grades for candidates should be added, so that in future there will be three classes of certificates and diplomas respectively.

SIR JOSEPH BARNBY received, at the Guildhall School of Music, on the 8th ult., a presentation from about 900 of the students, as an expression of their sympathy for him in his recent severe illness and of their congratulations on his recovery.

MUSIC IN BIRMINGHAM.

(FROM OUR OWN CORRESPONDENT.)

THE musical season here may be said to have come to its close with the final Concert, on the 18th ult., of Mr. Stockley's orchestral series. The novelty of the evening was Dr. Iliffe's Festal Overture in D, which work the composer himself conducted. It is a well-written composition—classic lines being adhered to closely—clear and melodious throughout, while making no great demands upon the hearer. It met with a very good reception. At the previous Concert—which came too late for our notice—we must record here the very successful performances of Dr. Mackenzie's Scotch Rhapsody (Burns), "Britannia" Overture, and Intermezzo from "The Rose of Sharon," the composer conducting. At the same Concert, Mr. Leonard Borwick made a notable presentation of Chopin's Concerto in E minor.

At the final Concert of the Festival Choral Society (March 28), two works produced at the Festival of last year were re-presented—viz., "The Swan and the Skylark," by the late Goring Thomas; and Berlioz's "Te Deum." The latter work was given with all the additional orchestral adjuncts, and, in every respect, it was a splendidly complete and worthy performance. The programme also included Mendelssohn's "As the hart pants"; Miss Evangeline Florence, in the soprano part of the latter piece, made an excellent impression. Mr. Stockley, who has for so many years officiated as chorus-master to this Society, has determined to resign his office; and after such lengthy and devoted service the severance of choir and conductor will be felt with much regret.

Mr. Halford's Choral Society has produced Handel's "Saul"; while the choral body ruled by Mr. Stevenson made a fairly satisfactory essay, on Good Friday, with Gounod's "Redemption." Much intelligence was shown by the chorists, and the solos were carefully sung by Miss L. Taylor, Miss E. Locker, Miss F. Bourne, Mr. W. Evans, Mr. Roper, and Mr. Harris. Justice was also done to the instrumental portion, and the fine work made its usual impressive effect. During the evening the Conductor was presented with a silver-mounted bâton.

MUSIC IN BRISTOL.

(FROM OUR OWN CORRESPONDENT.)

THE chief musical events of the month of March came towards the end. The Gleemen's Ladies' Night fell on the 20th ult., where a numerous assemblage gathered in the largest hall of the Victoria Rooms to hear the younger male-voice choir sing familiar and new compositions. They were Hatton's "Stars of the Summer Night," Abt's "The Evening Bell," Kunze's "The Sailor's Song" (solo by Mr. W. H. Wickes), Fischer's "The Forest Song," a new glee, "Oh! bring me a bumper," of a patriotic character (composed by T. H. Cooke for the Gleemen), Witt's "Lady, awake!" (solo by Mr. J. W. Davey), Abt's "Farewell, thou lovely forest glade," Commer's "Gondoliers' Song" (solo by Mr. J. H. Iles), Stehle's "Polish Patriotic Song," Hatton's "Warrior's Song," Reichardt's "Image of the Rose" (solo by Mr. W. D. Merrell), Kucken's "Rest, dearest, rest," Trühn's "The Three Chafers," Weber's "Silent night of dusky fame," "O Sanctissima," and Engelsberg's "The Students' March." These pieces were sung with varying degrees of excellence, under the direction of Mr. W. J. Kidner, and were warmly appreciated by the audience, who encored several of them.

On March 23 a remarkably fine performance of Mendelssohn's "Elijah" was given by the Bristol Choral Society, the largest of the kind in the city, numbering 500 members. Familiar as the Oratorio is, it received careful preparation under Mr. Riseley, who is a somewhat exacting trainer, but as a rule the end justifies the means. The principal vocalists were Miss Esther Palliser, Miss Jessie King, Mr. Charles Chiley, and Mr. Andrew Black; in the concerted numbers assistance was rendered by Miss Cromeey, Miss Clara Aldersley, Mrs. Probert Goodwin, Mrs. Baker, Mr. A. E. Gough, and Mr. W. Thomas. These did their work with a high degree of satisfaction, but the feature of the performance was the truly magnificent singing of the choir. The precision, unity, intonation, tone-shading, enunciation, and the quality of the voices were in every way delightful; so perfect, indeed, was the rendering of the choruses that scarcely a flaw could be detected. The band, led by Mr. Theo. Carrington, did well, and the playing of Mr. Fulford, the organist, deserves recognition. Mr. Riseley, the painstaking Conductor, was hailed with rounds of applause when he returned to his place after the interval.

The first annual Festival of the Bristol South Non-conformist Choir Association took place on March 25, at Ebenezer Wesleyan Chapel, Bedminster, and was attended by a gratifying measure of success. The anthems chosen were Dr. Clark-Whitfield's "Behold, how good and joyful," Sir John Goss's "O taste and see," Himmell's "Incline thine ear," and Stainer's "What are these." The hymns were sung to tunes taken from the Bristol Tune Book.

The Clifton Amateur Orchestral Society and a choir of about 100 voices gave a representation of Mendelssohn's "Hymn of Praise," at Highbury Chapel, on the 2nd ult., under the direction of Mr. Edward Pavey. The work was repeated by the same singers and executants in Tyndall Chapel two days later. The performances were far from faultless, and when the symphony cantata is brought forward again by the same body it would be well to spend even more time in shaping and polishing the beautiful, but by no means easy, work.

Bristol South Musical Society's sixth Annual Concert took place on the 3rd ult., in Bedminster Town Hall, under the direction of Mr. E. T. Morgan. A praiseworthy interpretation was given of Van Bree's pretty cantata "St. Cecilia's Day," and some well chosen glees were also sung.

The increasing popularity of Stainer's "Crucifixion" is shown by the fact that it was performed in more churches than usual during Lent. One more encouraging sign of the progress of good music among the toilers is shown by the church cantata being given at Christ Church, Barton Hill, where none but workers—some of the poorest—reside.

The rendering of Gounod's "Messe Solennelle," with orchestra and organ, at the church of Holy Nativity, Knowle, on the 14th ult., marks a further step onwards in church music in that growing suburb of Bristol.

At the annual Concert of Mr. Vaughan Tittle, which took place in Redland Park Hall, on the 16th ult., Sterndale Bennett's "May Queen" received a commendable representation under Mr. Tittle's guidance. The principal vocalists were Miss Jessie Sweet, Miss Maud Bryant, Mr. E. Young, Mr. A. G. Preston, and Mr. F. E. Preston.

A company of exceptionally clever amateurs, whose enjoyable performances of Gilbert and Sullivan's operas have been warmly spoken of in these columns, gave a representation of "Princess Ida," on the 17th, 18th, and 19th ult., at Clifton. So good all round was the portrayal of the work that those who took the chief characters deserve to be mentioned. These were King Hildebrand, Mr. Cyril B. Rootham; Hilarion, Mr. Charles Lodge; Cyril, Mr. J. Walter Boddy; Florian, Mr. Alban Young; King Gama, Mr. Percy W. Rootham; Arac, Mr. Sydney Rawnsley; Guron, Mr. Frederick W. Miller; Scynthus, Mr. Arthur E. Ham; Princess Ida, Miss Ethel Miller; Lady Blanche, Miss Kate Holbrook; Lady Psyche, Miss Marion Harris; Melissa, Mrs. A. Bruce Bedells; Sacharissa, Mrs. Harold Bernard; Chloë, Miss Ettie Wilkinson; Ada, Miss Hetty Trott. Not only did these well-trained ladies and gentlemen accomplish their work admirably, but the members of the chorus did well also, and helped in a great measure to make the performances so pleasurable. The mounting was charming. Mr. A. Bruce Bedells (manager and musical director), Mr. Frank Morris (stage manager), and Mr. Harold Bernard (leader of the orchestra) deserve praise for the efforts they made to ensure the success which attended the venture.

The students of the Bristol and Clifton Training School of Music gave their annual Concert on March 29, when they contributed violin, pianoforte, and vocal solos, and a few concerted pieces.

At the third Chamber Concert of Miss Lock, with which the present season closed on March 25, Smetana's String Quartet in E minor was the chief feature; this, together with Grieg's Sonata in A minor (Op. 36) for violin and pianoforte, being played for the first time in Bristol. Both were received with cordiality. Haydn's String Quartet in E flat, Tartini's Violin Sonata—"La Trille du Diable"—and a couple of trifles for pianoforte by Adolf Jensen, completed the list of instrumental pieces. The executants were the same as hitherto, and Miss Alice Davis contributed songs.

Concerts of a miscellaneous order have been continued weekly at the Clifton Spa. Paderewski paid us a return visit on the 1st ult. The Arthur Rousbey Opera Company gave representations of familiar operas, at the Princes' Theatre, during the week beginning the 15th ult., the works brought forward being "The Bohemian Girl," "The Daughter of the Regiment," "Maritana," "Cavalleria Rusticana," "Rigoletto," and "Faust."

Chipping Sodbury Choral Society sang Mozart's "Splendente Te, Deus," and selections from Handel's "Messiah," on the 3rd ult., under the direction of Mr. A. J. Foxwell.

The Cheddar Choral Society contributed excerpts from Mendelssohn's "St. Paul" and "Elijah" on the 2nd ult. Mr. Burnett conducted.

An Organ Recital was given by Mr. W. Haynes, on Easter Tuesday, at St. Bartholomew's Church, Bristol, on the new organ recently erected by Messrs. Nicholson and Co., of Worcester. The programme included pieces by Bach, Rink, Rossini, Batiste, Guilman, and Handel, and Mr. Haynes's ability fully displayed the excellent qualities of the new organ.

MUSIC IN DUNDEE.

(FROM OUR OWN CORRESPONDENT.)

THE last Harrison-Simpson Concert of the present series was held on March 22. It was the means of bringing Sir Charles Hallé's orchestra once more to Dundee after a lapse of some years, and was the most interesting Concert of the series. Excellent performances were given of Weber's "Oberon" Overture, Brahms's "Variations on a Theme by Haydn," Mozart's E flat Symphony, Humperdinck's Overture to "Hänsel und Gretel," Tschaiowsky's Elegie in G, and Wagner's "Tannhäuser" Overture. Sir Charles, who was most warmly welcomed, appeared not only as Conductor, but also as pianist in Chopin's Fantasia in F minor. Madame Alice Gomez was successful in songs by M. V. White, and Leo Stern and the Meister Glee Singers gave quite a perfect rendering of Sullivan's part-song "The long day closes." Their other songs were not worthy of the programme.

The Dundee Amateur Choral Union gave its second Concert of the season on the 2nd ult. The first part of the programme introduced Dr. Sawyer's new cantata "Orpheus," which gained the prize of £100 offered by Messrs. Methven, Simpson and Co. for the best cantata by a British composer. It was performed for the first time with full orchestral accompaniment, and had a moderate success. The difficult solo work was well performed by Madame Marie Duma and Mr. Iver McKay. The second part of the programme was miscellaneous, the principal pieces being excerpts from "Lohengrin" and "Die Meistersinger," and Weber's "Jubel" Overture, which was excellently played. Mr. Carl D. Hamilton was, as usual, an efficient Conductor.

On the 3rd ult. a successful Concert was given by the Dundee Select Choir, under the conductorship of Mr. H. Marshall.

The enterprising Dundee Orchestral Society, which, in spite of being its first season, already numbers forty amateur performers, gave its first Concert on the 5th ult., with Mr. A. M. Stoele as Conductor. The orchestra played throughout with great care and refinement, and was successful even in Beethoven's Fourth Symphony. The soloists were Miss Alexander (pianist), Mrs. Macleod and Miss Amy Smith (vocalists), who were warmly received.

MUSIC IN EAST ANGLIA.

(FROM OUR OWN CORRESPONDENT.)

DR. BATES, the Cathedral organist, gave a highly interesting Lecture at the Norwich Church of England Young Men's Society's Rooms on the 3rd ult., talking for his subject "The Influence of the Church on Music and Musicians." The lecturer traced the growth of church music from A.D. 330, when St. Sylvester established a singing school at Rome, and described the gradual development of the art between that period and the present time. Illustrations, selected from different composers, were sung by a contingent of voices from the Cathedral choir.

On Good Friday the annual performance of "The Messiah," given under the auspices of Dr. Bunnnett and Dr. Hill, for the benefit of the local charities, took place in St. Andrew's Hall, Norwich. The solo quartet comprised Miss Regina de Sales, Miss Marie Hooton, Mr. E. Branscombe and Mr. Ffrangcon-Davies, the three first-named artists being strangers to Norwich. The bulk of the Festival Choir and the Norwich Philharmonic Society were answerable for the choruses and accompaniments. Under the baton of Dr. Hill a very satisfactory performance was given, Dr. Bunnnett doing yeoman service at the organ.

The concluding Popular Organ Recital of the season, under the management of the City Organist (Dr. Bunnnett), came off in St. Andrew's Hall on the 20th ult. Additional éclat was given to the occasion by the voluntary help of the Festival chorus and the band of the Philharmonic Society. Solos were sung by Miss Beatrice Semmence, Miss May Seiber, Mr. S. Hemmings, and Mr. W. N. Ladell. A varied and interesting programme was arranged, and listened to with unflagging interest by an audience numbering nearly 1,800 persons. Dr. Hill conducted the choruses and instrumental selections, and during the evening the Mayor (Col. Bignold) expressed the thanks of the Corporation, under whose guidance these entertainments are carried on, to those ladies and gentlemen who by their gratuitous assistance contributed so much to the success of the undertaking. During the twenty-five Recitals which have taken place since November last, 17,000 persons have availed themselves of the opportunity thus given of enjoying high-class music at a merely nominal cost, and as an educational effort on the part of the Corporation the movement cannot be too highly commended.

The North Walsham Amateur Musical Society brought the season to a close on the 17th ult. The members sang several part-songs, conducted by Dr. Hill, in good style. The principal performers were Miss Blanche Powell (soprano), Mrs. John Wilkinson (contralto), Mr. S. Hemmings (tenor), and Mr. W. N. Ladell (bass), who acquitted themselves much to the satisfaction of the audience. A feature of the Concert was the appearance of Mr. H. Kingston Rudd from Norwich, whose superb pianoforte playing is so well known in the district. His execution of Beethoven's "Moonlight" Sonata brought a storm of applause, but later, after Liszt's "Carnaval de Pesth," nothing less than a re-appearance at the instrument would suffice, which Mr. Rudd complied with, playing a piece by Chopin.

The Bury St. Edmund's Choral Association gave a performance of Mendelssohn's "Elijah," on March 25, conducted by Mr. Owen A. Clark. Unfortunately, the Society has not been a financial success, but it is hoped the very careful and, on the whole, satisfactory way in which Mendelssohn's oratorio was produced may lead to increased support from the inhabitants. The principal parts were sustained by Miss Maud Percival-Allen, Miss Nellie Richardson, Rev. A. W. Ivatt, and Mr. Edward Iles, the three last-named being local residents. The band and chorus were also mostly residents of the town and neighbourhood and their part of the work reflected great credit upon Mr. Clark's careful training.

A Concert was given in Ipswich, on the 18th ult., by the St. Margaret's Choral and Orchestral Society, assisted by friends from Woodbridge and Manningtree, conducted by Mr. James Price. When it is said that the programme included Schubert's Unfinished Symphony, a movement from one of Mozart's Symphonies, and four choruses from Bottesini's "Garden of Olivet," it will be admitted that the Society is more than usually ambitious. Miss Nellie Taylor, Miss Gertrude Bevan, and Mr. King-Smith were the solo vocalists, while Mr. Barrington Hunnibell and Mr. Price played several violoncello and pianoforte solos.

The Felixstowe Choral Society closed its season with a performance of Handel's "Judas Maccabeus," at the Victoria Hall, on the 17th ult., before a large audience.

With a band of twenty-four performers and a chorus numbering upwards of eighty voices, conducted by Mr. T. Palmer, fair justice was done to the work undertaken. The usual failing of amateurs was, however, noticeable—viz., want of attention to the expression marks; but more practice will help to reduce this fault to a minimum. The solos were sung by Miss Florence Monk, Miss Kathleen Walton, Mr. Sawford Dye, and Mr. Arthur Walenn.

MUSIC IN EDINBURGH.

(FROM OUR OWN CORRESPONDENT.)

THE recognition of Eastertide is rapidly spreading in Presbyterian churches, and many "Recitals of Sacred Music," more or less appropriate, were given during Holy Week. At St. Mary's Cathedral, Haydn's "Passion" was performed, with orchestral accompaniment, under the direction of Mr. Collinson; and at St. Paul's, York Place, Gounod's "Redemption" (Part I.) was given by the choir, trained by Mr. Prendergast, who supplied the organ accompaniment.

Mr. Kirkhope's Choir is never more successful than when interpreting Mendelssohn's music, and the performance of "St. Paul," on the 3rd ult., in the Music Hall, was a magnificent success. The chorus numbers now nearly two hundred, but has lost none of its precision and care in nuance, while the volume of tone has been materially increased. Among the soloists Mr. Andrew Black was facile princeps; he sang "O God, have mercy," with thrilling effect. Madame Bertha Moore was very successful in the soprano solos, Miss Marion Brown won great favour in the contralto music, and Mr. Edward Branscombe found very congenial work in the lovely tenor solos. The accompaniments were played by an orchestra of about forty, under the leadership of Mr. Daly.

Mr. Millar Craig's Choir had chosen MacCunn's "Lord Ullin's Daughter" and Mackenzie's "Jason" for study this season, and under Mr. Craig's careful direction these works were performed in the Queen Street Hall, on the 9th ult., before a very good audience. Miss Kate Gray was the most successful of the soloists. A string quintet, pianoforte, and harmonium supplied a somewhat inadequate accompaniment.

Professor Niecks has, with untiring and self-sacrificing energy, pursued his aim of making the Reid Chair an active influence, and the music classes at Edinburgh University something more substantial than merely pious dreams. He has personally conducted classes in (1) History, (2) Analysis, (3) Harmony, Melody, and Rhythm, (4) Advanced Ditto, and (5) Counterpoint and Composition—in all, 140 lectures. The total number of students has been about seventy, of whom three-fourths have been continuing their studies of last year. The quality of the work done has given great satisfaction.

Besides the regular classes, Professor Niecks further organised a series of six historical Concerts, at intervals of about a month, in which the development of the Quartet, from Boccherini and Haydn to Brahms, was profusely illustrated. Haydn was represented by Opus 1, No. 1; Opus 33, No. 3, and Opus 76, Nos. 2 and 3; Mozart by Quartets in C major and F major; Beethoven by Opus 18, No. 4; Opus 59, No. 2, and Opus 132; and Quartets by Boccherini, Schubert, Cherubini, Mendelssohn, Schumann, Smetana, and Brahms were also included in the interesting scheme. The Professor secured adequate rehearsal by himself undertaking the first violin part, and he was ably assisted by Messrs. Guyer, Colin Mackenzie, and Grant McNeill.

Messrs. Paterson's highly successful series of Concerts and Recitals was brought to a close on March 26, when Mons. Slivinski made his second appearance in Edinburgh in an interesting programme of the orthodox pattern. A good audience gave the distinguished pianist a warm welcome.

Messrs. Sauer and Siloti also gave Pianoforte Recitals during last month.

MUSIC IN GLASGOW.

(FROM OUR OWN CORRESPONDENT.)

THE West of Scotland Section of the Incorporated Society of Musicians was "At Home" on March 29. A large and brilliant company—which included Lord and Lady Kelvin, Sir Francis and Lady Powell, and other notabilities—assembled in the Windsor Hotel, and under the genial and experienced charge of Messrs. Julius and Harry Selgmann a pleasant evening was spent.

The musical season proper was, of course, brought to a close several weeks ago. Of late, however, various smaller choral societies have done some good work, and, amongst others, the members of the Queen's Park Free Church Musical Association again came well to the front. The first part of their Concert, on the 4th ult., was devoted to a performance of Gaul's "Ruth," a work whose popularity increases in the West of Scotland as, indeed, elsewhere year by year. The choruses were admirably sung, and a quartet of local artists did the solos ample justice. On the evening just named the Kent Road United Presbyterian Church Musical Association gave Shinn's Oratorio "The Captives of Babylon" with a large measure of success, and "Samson" was also essayed by the Victoria Free Church Musical Association. Handel's work was accorded a wonderfully good interpretation, and the solos were in competent hands. The evening of the 4th ult. likewise introduced a new children's operetta, entitled "Up to Date," wherein a good deal of fun is poked at education fads of an advanced type. The music is bright and tuneful, and some of it so good that Mr. Atkins, the composer, ought to be encouraged to aim at higher things.

The semi-jubilee of the Glasgow Amateur Orchestral Society was celebrated on the evening of the 10th ult., when the programme was entirely devoted to works by Scottish composers. This was a happy arrangement, inasmuch as the choice of a selection of good things was quite at hand. Sir A. C. Mackenzie was, for example, represented by his beautiful Prelude to "Colomba," by his stimulating dance from "Pibroch," and by a song, "The earth below and the heaven above," which ought to be better known than it appears to be. Mr. Hamish MacCunn's familiar orchestral ballad "The Ship o' the Fiend" was also in the programme, and a Concert-Overture by the Society's able Conductor, Mr. W. T. Hoeck, showed, as regards orchestration, considerable progress in the knowledge of orchestral resource. The place of honour was reserved for Mr. Charles Macpherson's "Highland" Suite, a work of bright promise, which was heard for the first time North of the Tweed. In each and all of the four movements there are pleasant whiffs of the Caledonian "caller" air; the themes are refined and characteristic, and the treatment throughout is often skilful and picturesque. The band of the Society numbers, it should be mentioned, nearly ninety performers, sixteen of whom are lady executants, and as regards previous appearances, the Concert under brief notice was far and away in advance of any former experience. One or two of the pieces might, indeed, have done credit to a band of professional players.

The Royal Carl Rosa Opera Company began a short engagement at the Royalty Theatre on the 22nd ult., and gave the following works for the first time in Glasgow—"Ivanhoe," "Hänsel und Gretel," and "Bastien and Bastienne."

The St. Peter's Choral Society gave its first Concert in the Berkeley Hall, St. Andrew's Halls, on the 18th ult., when a sacred cantata, "Jerusalem," by W. H. Dixon, and several part-songs were sung. The vocalists were Miss M. Orr, Miss K. Miller, Mr. W. H. Cooper, and Mr. H. McNeill. Mr. Albert J. Gray conducted.

At the annual Concert of the Glasgow Glee and Catch Club some excellent part-singing is always to the fore. The programmes are invariably drawn from standard sources, and, on the 18th ult., Mr. Alaa W. Young, the popular Conductor, again submitted a choice selection of glees, &c., stamped with the hall-mark of wide approval. The only novelty in the programme very soon secured attention. This was Mr. T. S. Drummond's "Harvest Tide," a glee which was heard for the first time, and which cannot fail to find a permanent place in the répertoire of the Club by reason of its appropriate treatment. Like almost every piece in the programme, it was sung with true artistic perception, and at the conclusion of the piece the composer was warmly called to the platform.

MUSIC IN LIVERPOOL.

(FROM OUR OWN CORRESPONDENT.)

It seems to have become the practice of the Philharmonic Society to give its subscribers, as season after season has of late progressed, something thoroughly stereotyped and something else comparatively, if not utterly, unfamiliar in the line of choral works. On the one hand, we have had in successive years Handel's "Messiah" and "Judas," Mendelssohn's "Elijah," and, on the other, Liszt's "St. Elizabeth," Rubinstein's "Tower of Babel," and Tinel's "St. Francis." The last-named composition formed the programme of the final Concert, given on March 26, and to a large extent it proved acceptable, though, like many another early effort on the part of writers of dramatic cantatas or oratorios, it would have gained by compression. To go into the details of such a lengthy composition, within the limits of the present summary, would be out of the question; but it may be remarked that it abounds in strongly contrasted situations and warmth of tone-colour, that the story or "book" is as good as could be desired, and that the whole work may be worthily placed side by side with others of its class in the ranks of those which bear the somewhat comprehensive title of oratorio as written at the close of the nineteenth century. The performance was of all-round excellence, and Sir Charles Hallé, as usual, conducted.

The other most important choral event in this district has been the annual Spring Concert of the Chester Musical Society, on the 22nd ult. The programme comprised Sullivan's "Martyr of Antioch" and the "Easter Hymn" from Mascagni's "Cavalleria Rusticana." For these occasions Dr. J. C. Bridge usually engages an excellent orchestra, and the instrumental work laid under contribution on the date named was Beethoven's "Pastoral" Symphony. Such performances as these serve well to keep the light of art burning in the Cestrian city, which, but for its triennial Festival, can hardly be reckoned among the strongholds of music. In the same locality, on the 16th ult., the Chester Orchestral Society gave an excellent, if not very ambitious programme, with good effect, under Mr. W. J. Hughes.

The Liverpool Orchestral Society brought its season to a worthy close on the 6th ult. with a Ladies' Concert at the Philharmonic Hall, under Mr. Rodewald; and a week or so later the Societa Armonica did the same at the Mount Street Institute, under Mr. W. Caferata. A very good Orchestral Concert was given by the students of the Music School on the 4th ult., under Mr. Courvoisier, Haydn's unfamiliar Symphony in C minor, No. 9 (Breitkopf's edition), and Beethoven's third Pianoforte Concerto being included in the programme. The Schiever Quartet, with the aid of Mr. Bispham as vocalist, closed their most delightful series of Matinées on the 6th ult., the results of the latest appearances of the gentlemen in question being of such artistic merit and so heartily encouraged as to lead to the hope that something on even more extended lines will be attempted by them another season.

The Lenten Oratorio Services at the Pro-Cathedral, where, as usual, Spohr's "Calvary" has been given under Mr. Burstall, have been worthily emulated elsewhere, and notably at Waterloo, where the united Church choirs of the district, brought together by Mr. H. Griffiths and conducted by Mr. G. Legge, have given Gaul's "Holy City." At Holywell, Dr. Stainer's "Crucifixion" has been given by the Church Choral Society, under Mr. E. Robinson, of Chester. A Welsh Festival was held in Liverpool, on the 3rd ult., at Dr. Raffle's Chapel, the conductorship being in the hands of Mr. W. Emlyn Jones.

The Alexandra Theatre, of which the foundation stone was laid by the late Mlle. Tietjens in 1866, and which remained for nearly a quarter of a century the premier place of entertainment in the city, has, after being closed for half-a-dozen years or more, been taken over by Mr. Hollingshead for variety purposes. On Good Friday here, and at the Royal Court Theatre, selections of sacred music were given, each including the music of Rossini's "Stabat Mater." The conductors respectively were Dr. Churchill Sibley and Mr. J. D. Shepherd. At St. George's Hall, on the same day, the time-honoured custom of giving Handel's "Messiah" gratis for the poor was carried out, the Conductor being Mr. J. C. Clarke, of Southport.

A successful Concert was given in Hope Hall on the 20th ult., under the conductorship of Mr. Josef Cantor. The vocalists were Miss M. Burnett, Miss A. Gibson, and Mr. G. Platt. Much appreciated assistance was contributed by "The Besses o' th' Barn" brass band, conducted by Mr. A. Owen.

MUSIC IN MANCHESTER.

(FROM OUR OWN CORRESPONDENT.)

As, for a time, the activity of our various local associations wanes, we look more eagerly for the coming of those who may cheer us during the still cold evenings; and we especially enjoy the re-appearance of our old friends of the Royal Carl Rosa Opera Company. Twice a year, at least, they find us ready to receive them with a welcome which will always be hearty so long as they come prepared to offer us a varied and judiciously arranged programme of works well within their powers. The success of many former visits has been lessened by that obstinate clinging to the idea that English people never tire of their old favourites—whether works or performers—which seems to cloud the minds of so many of those who essay to cater for the public. Mr. Friend seems to take a broader view of the situation, to be shaking off the pessimistic traditions of former managers, and to recognise that the time must come when even the classics of the lyric stage—not to mention the trivial ballad compilations which have profanely been called operas—must grow nauseously familiar, and when everybody must yearn for something fresher. And a lesson, much needed by other of "Her Majesty's servants," may be learnt from the record of the six weeks' sojourn among us of the Carl Rosa Company, and by noting the fact that night after night the theatre has been crowded by those eager to hear the lively and yet scholarly "Hänsel und Gretel" of Humperdinck, and the serious and semi-historic "Ivanhoe" of Sullivan, who have resolutely refused to be lured any longer by the works to which, year after year, they have listened like good children gratefully and submissively accepting whatever their elders thought fit to provide for them. Of course, mere novelty of subject, without freshness of idea and treatment, will not suffice. The lovers of opera are not the ordinary theatre-goers, desiring little beyond the whiling away of an idle hour, ready to swallow any amount of eulogistic so-called criticism, or to be beguiled by the announcement of a "specially commissioned" work, and unable to detect the roughness and inexperience of a 'prentice hand.

It would be unjust not to acknowledge the admirable manner in which Mlle. Duma has responded to the somewhat excessive demands made upon her during the six weeks. Probably the reproduction of "Esmeralda" was deferred until the last evening through a sense of the danger of unduly testing the loyalty to the company of the prima donna. The enthusiasm with which the work of poor Goring Thomas was received was an additional evidence of the wisdom of energetic management, and should lead to a like revival of his "Nadeshda."

But, after all, the state of Art in any district is not to be measured by the readiness of the people to accept the efforts of their visitants; but by the healthy home progress made, and by the wise and systematic development of the local resources. And, at the close of our season, naturally and very usefully, our thoughts may revert to the past, and we may seek to estimate the real value of its history. As we thus look back our gratitude and hopefulness are warmed and strengthened by a sense of the continued excellence of those Thursday evening Concerts which obviously stand in the forefront of our musical doings; and we especially congratulate ourselves that, as yet, there are no signs of waning interest or of less careful management. Whatever may be lacking in our musical organisation, we are particularly happy in having among us so strong an administrator as Sir Charles Hallé, and a staff of assistants so able, and so admirably disciplined, as has been under his control for some thirty-seven seasons.

On the other hand, we still have to bewail the apparent impossibility of creating a strong interest in chamber music, although Mr. Hess, during his too brief stay with us, has, like many predecessors, laboured with self-denying zeal to kindle and to stimulate it. It is not difficult to understand the apathy which we lament; but the fact remains that the disinclination to study the smaller works of the great masters and to follow the development of those lighter fancies which they did not emblazon with the richness of colouring of orchestrally contrasted tone, leaves us destitute of one of the highest and most educational of art influences. The removal of our larger undertakings to the more fitting area of the Free Trade Hall seemed to free the smaller room built for, and for so many years devoted to, the "Gentlemen's Concerts" for the serious cultivation of works which appeal mainly to those more earnest students, who do not appear to be as numerous as they should be, in a city boasting loudly of its artistic proclivities.

Another of our misfortunes and hindrances lies in the fact that in a place once a centre of choral activity a strange lapse of energy has, of late years, prevailed. Sir Charles Hallé's choir (under the able tutelage of Mr. Wilson) maintains its excellence; and the annual presentations of well-known oratorios prove extremely attractive; but the welcome given to new or unfamiliar works is not encouraging. Surely it cannot be that only under the stimulus of a triennial Festival may be excited that old love of choral music which used to be the proud boast of these northern counties? An attempt—which we hope may prove abundantly successful—will shortly be made still further to popularize orchestral music, and to establish upon a firmer basis than heretofore a series of Saturday evening entertainments of attractive character. The hope may be suffered that the old taste may be found yet ardent among those classes in which the love of music was always keenest and most healthy, and that an undiminished delight in oratorio may be manifested by the great mass of the people.

Among our lighter enjoyments we count the star Concerts which the Messrs. Harrison have now pretty firmly established here. We have also the long series of entertainments devised by Mr. Cross, and the persistent efforts of Mr. Lane and the Philharmonic Choir; while at the Town Hall the Organ Recitals of Mr. Pyne prove attractive in a degree perhaps scarcely equalled anywhere else.

Turning to the more directly educational efforts, upon the welfare of which progress must so largely depend, it is gratifying to find that the University classes held by Dr. Hiles are increasingly successful, and that the movement, of which he has been the pioneer, of establishing a regular course of collegiate instruction in composition and musical history is likely to be followed elsewhere. The progress of the Royal Manchester College of Music is also most satisfactory, and each term brings such an accession of strength as must tend to the consolidation of the Institution and to the enforcement of such discipline as may render it in the future increasingly useful. And, lastly, the humbler link in this long chain of development has been tested and has proved satisfactory. Two evenings have been devoted to the examination of the violin classes which, three years ago, were commenced in some of the higher grade Board schools, and which were fostered by the liberality of the Technical Committee of the Corporation. The full results have not yet been published; but they are understood to have been very satisfactory and to have justified the hope expressed before the initiation of the scheme that, from the rudimentary stages, a small percentage of students must periodically emerge for which higher instruction should be provided. Thus only may that long desired continuity of tuition in music be attained which now is offered in every other educational subject; so that from the Board school rudimentary training, through the more careful supervision of the College of Music, to the composition and history classes of the University, a regular course of systematic guidance may be devised securing the utmost possible utilisation of our local talent.

Thus viewed, although our progress may seem to have been somewhat slow, it is clear that we are moving on, and that the rate of progress may be accelerated by a clear recognition of the obstacles yet to be surmounted and a frank admission of the wants not yet met.

MUSIC IN NORTH STAFFORDSHIRE.

(FROM OUR OWN CORRESPONDENT.)

THE Hanley Glee and Madrigal Society is a striking example of the success of persistent and intelligent practice as the foundation of musical progress. From a very humble beginning it has in thirteen seasons made a reputation for "thoroughness" in all its work, and now it stands at the head of the local choral organisations. The final performance of the season was given on March 28, in the Victoria Hall, Hanley, before a large and representative audience. Mr. James Garner, founder and conductor, had under his direction the well-balanced chorus of the Society and a selected orchestra from Sir Charles Hallé's band, assisted by several local amateurs. The programme was lengthy and varied, including part of Haydn's "Creation," Stanford's setting of Tennyson's "Revenge," Dudley Buck's "Hymn to Music," and Cowen's "Bridal Chorus." For the first named Madame Fanny Moody, Mr. Charles Manners, and Mr. John Child supplied the solo numbers, evoking unstinted applause from the audience for the dramatic power of their vocalisation. The chorus was well balanced and throughout gave signs of excellent training, and the unaccompanied singing of Dudley Buck's "Hymn to Music" was the prominent feature of the lengthy programme. Mr. T. Johnson presided at the organ, and Mr. Weatherby discharged the secretarial duties.

Mr. W. Shenton received at the close of the Silverdale Prize Choir's Concert, on the 4th ult., a purse of gold from the members and friends. Mr. F. Mountford, in making the presentation, referred to the work of the Choir in the past and hoped the members would rally round Mr. Shenton next season.

The Annual General Meeting of the shareholders of the Tonic Sol-fa College was held, on the 8th ult., at the Town Hall, Hanley. The report and balance sheet were received and adopted and the Board of Examiners appointed. Messrs. T. Turnock (Chairman), J. A. MacGregor (Vice-Chairman), W. E. Wood, W. H. Boote, G. Glover, J. Faulkes, S. Hughes, W. Hollinshead, F. J. Stone, and C. Oliver (Hon. Sec.) were re-elected for the year.

The Howson (Summer Term) Scholarship is open to the Tonic Sol-faists of the district.

The Longton Choral Society closed its season with a miscellaneous Concert in the Town Hall on the 18th ult. The chorus, under the direction of Mr. E. H. Bloor, rendered several part-songs, and Miss E. Penn, Miss Edwards, Miss E. Gaunt, Mr. Booth, Mr. Foxall, Mr. F. H. Heath, and Mr. T. Morley supplied solos, completing the vocal portion of the programme. Miss Lucy Hollis, Mr. F. W. Hollis, Mr. W. E. Simpson, and Mr. F. Powis played selections for violin, viola, and violoncello. Mr. B. B. Walker acted as accompanist.

At Tutbury, on the 18th ult., the Uttoxeter, Tutbury, and Rocester Choral Societies presented Gaul's "Holy City." Mr. H. A. Branscombe, of Liverpool, presided at the organ, and Miss Maggie Jaques, Miss Florence Bourne, and Messrs. Noon and England rendered the solos. Mr. H. Drury conducted, and the choir sang with taste and expression.

MUSIC IN NORTHUMBERLAND AND DURHAM.

(FROM OUR OWN CORRESPONDENT.)

THE musical season is rapidly drawing to a close, and events of special interest and importance are becoming few and far between. The annual Invitation Concert of the Northumberland Orchestral Society took place in the Town Hall, Newcastle-on-Tyne, on the 4th ult., and was particularly successful. The programme included Overtures by Reissiger and Sullivan, Reinecke's "King Manfred" Vorspeil, and Gade's No. 4 Symphony. Mr. J. H. Beers, the highly esteemed Conductor of the Society and a local violinist of considerable repute, played Hans Sitt's well-known Cavatine. The vocalist was Madame Marie Bellas, who gave, amongst other things, a very praiseworthy rendering of "Che farò" from Gluck's "Orpheus." There are special reasons why the Northumberland Orchestral Society should be warmly encouraged. It is an undoubted fact that, but for the voluntary assistance cheerfully given by the amateur members of the Society the production of many of the important works for voices and orchestra, performed in recent years by choral societies in this district, would have been all but impracticable. The assistance given by members of the Society in performing these works has been invaluable, and is gratefully acknowledged by all interested parties.

The annual meeting of the Gateshead Choral Society took place early in the month, and the proceedings were marked by the display of considerable enthusiasm. The report gave the number of active members as 246, an increase of twenty-three upon last year; whilst the honorary membership showed an increase of 114, with a present total of 235. The year closed with a small balance in hand, and it was announced that Handel's "Israel in Egypt" would be placed in rehearsal for performance at the first Concert of next season.

The Tynemouth Amateur Vocal Society gave a very successful Concert on March 26, when Mr. F. H. Cowen's cantata "St. John's Eve" was performed, with the assistance of a small orchestra led by Mr. J. H. Beers. The principal vocalists were Miss H. M. Stevenson, Madame Marie Bellas, Mr. S. R. Heenan, and Mr. John Young; and the performance was conducted by Mr. William Bird. This Society, during the short period of its existence, has produced Cowen's "Rose Maiden," Gade's "Erl-King's Daughter," Schubert's "Song of Miriam," Mendelssohn's "Lauda Sion," Dudley Buck's "Hymn to Music," and Gaul's "Una." Some of these works had previously been performed in Tynemouth by the now defunct Tynemouth Philharmonic Society, a society which, during the twelve years of its existence, introduced to the locality most of the standard works for voices and orchestra and a large number of important modern works.

Several sacred works suitable to the occasion were performed in the churches of this district during Holy Week. At the Cathedral, Newcastle, on Good Friday, selections from Bach's "St. Matthew Passion" were given, under the direction of Dr. Huntley, the principal soloists being Miss Wadham, Miss Furze, Mr. J. Thomson, and Mr. Lyall. The performance was listened to by a very large congregation and was in every respect successful.

At other churches, Sir John Stainer's "Crucifixion" was very much in evidence. This work was also performed at the Church Institute, Newcastle, with much success, under the direction of Mr. E. J. Gibbon.

"The Messiah" was selected for performance by the choir of the Consett Wesleyan Church. The principals were Miss L. Calvert, Miss Minnie Beers, Mr. Charles Davison, Mr. Joseph Liddle, and Mr. John Nutton. Mr. C. Stelling presided at the organ, and Mr. William Lowrie conducted.

The Durham Amateur Orchestral Society, under the conductorship of Signor Numa Zabban, gave its first Concert in Durham on March 25. The programme included three movements from Grieg's "Holberg" Suite, and pieces by Moer, Köhler, Massenet, Schubert, and others. The vocalists were Miss Bessie Furze, Miss M. Wadham, and Mr. W. Walton; and Miss Kitchen and Miss Brewis contributed solos upon the violoncello and violin respectively.

Mr. J. H. Beers's Ladies' Violin Class gave an interesting Musical Evening on the 18th ult., and Mr. Frederic Spencer gave a Musical Matinée on the afternoon of the 19th ult.—both in Newcastle.

MUSIC IN SHEFFIELD AND DISTRICT.

(FROM OUR OWN CORRESPONDENT.)

MADAME ALBANI visited Sheffield, on the 3rd ult., and sang with her accustomed success in the Albert Hall. The Concert party included Miss B. Langley, Miss Clara Butt, Messrs. Foli, Chillely, and Mattei.

The Chesterfield Orchestral Society gave a successful Concert in the Stephenson Memorial Hall on the 16th ult. The Society, which has been in existence about two years, has rapidly won an excellent reputation. The Conductor, Mr. N. Biggin, rehearses his forces well, and their performances are thoroughly admirable. Schubert's "Unfinished" Symphony in B minor was the principal feature in a long programme, which also included Grieg's "Peer Gynt"

Suite, the March from "Tannhäuser," and pieces by Delibes and Flotow. The vocalists were Miss Drew and Mr. Watkin Davies. Mr. John Beck was leader.

On Good Friday and during Passion Week, Stainer's "Crucifixion" has been given at various churches in Sheffield, Buxton, Ilkeston, &c.

Mr. John Asquith, who has just completed fifty years' service as organist of the Parish Church (St. Mary's), Barnsley, was, on the 13th ult., presented with an address and a purse containing eighty guineas by the clergy, choir, and congregation, in recognition of his ability, length of service, and devotion to duty.

The Darley Dale Choral Society gave the closing Concert of its seventh season in the Whitworth Institute Assembly Room, on the 16th ult. Mr. E. J. Chadfield, of Derby, directed the Concert. The programme included Weber's Mass in G, which was followed by a cantata, "King John and the Abbot of Canterbury." The principals were efficient, and the chorus-singing gave evidence of painstaking rehearsal. Miss Lizzie Davison accompanied.

—The Sheffield Choral Union performed Mendelssohn's "St. Paul" in the Music Hall on the 23rd ult. Mr. J. H. Parkes led the band, Mr. Clough was organist, and Mr. S. Suckley conducted.

MUSIC IN THE SOUTHERN COUNTIES.

(FROM OUR OWN CORRESPONDENT.)

THE Salisbury Philharmonic Society appeared at a Concert in the County Hall on the 25th ult. The programme was of a miscellaneous character, and the artists were Madame Alice Gomez, Miss Angela Vanbrugh, Miss Ella Taunton, and the Meister Glee Singers. Gaul's Ode, "A Song of Life," Mozart's "Ave Verum," and other short choral works were given by the Society, under the conductorship of Mr. Alfred Foley. An efficient orchestra, led by Mr. E. Jones, played the Overtures to the "Occasional Oratorio" (Handel) and "Prometheus" (Beethoven). On Thursday, the 4th ult., Stainer's "Crucifixion" was given at St. Thomas's Church, Salisbury, under the direction of Mr. J. M. Hayden. The solos were sung by members of the choir, and Mr. Bowey, Organist of the Church, presided at the organ.

The Downton Choral Society, which flourishes exceedingly under the conductorship of the Countess of Radnor, gave its annual Concert on the 23rd ult., when Hiller's "Song of Victory" was performed. The choir and orchestra numbered seventy performers, and gave evidence of much care bestowed upon rehearsal. Lady Radnor, Mr. Harcourt Coates, Miss Wrightson, Miss Margaret Hussey, the Rev. H. W. Carpenter, and the Hon. Stuart Bouverie were the soloists. The second part of the programme was miscellaneous.

On the 3rd ult. an excellent performance of Stainer's "Crucifixion" was given in the Parish Church, Wilton, under the direction of Mr. Naish, Organist of the Church. The solos were sung by the Rev. H. W. Carpenter and the Rev. S. Buchanan, and the "Meditation" made its usual significant impression upon the large congregation.

On Good Friday, Haydn's "Creation" was given in the Wesleyan Chapel, Frome, under the conductorship of Mr. T. Grant. The chorus numbered eighty, and there was a full orchestra, consisting chiefly of members of the Royal Marine Artillery and the Bath Pump-room bands. The soloists engaged were Miss Annie Lea, Mr. E. T. Morgan, and Mr. D. Harrison; and Mr. A. W. R. Cole, of Merton College, Oxford, was the Organist.

The Southampton Philharmonic Society, which has made rapid strides during the past twelve months, put forth all its strength for the Easter Concert, on the 23rd ult., at the Philharmonic Hall. Haydn's "Creation" had been selected for performance. The principal vocalists, selected for the occasion by Sir Joseph Barnby, one of the patrons of the Society, were Miss Ada Loaring, Mr. Lloyd Chandos, and Mr. Charles Phillips, and the band and chorus together numbered more than 140 performers. Mr. H. M. Pike occupied his accustomed place at the Conductor's desk. Stainer's "Crucifixion," which has been heard so frequently during the past month, was announced to be sung on Tuesday evening, the 9th ult., at the Above Bar Congregational Church, Southampton, the soloists being Mr. Leonard P. Hughes and Mr. F. Julyan, with Mr. Percy Withers at the organ. On the following Monday Gaul's "The Holy City" was given at the Wesleyan Church, East Street.

At Bournemouth, on the 4th ult., the Shaftesbury Hall Choir gave its annual Concert, which was largely attended. Gaul's pastoral cantata "Ruth," which composed the first part of the programme, was admirably performed under Mr. B. Mansell Ramsey's conductorship, the solos being undertaken by Mrs. Tetley, Miss Effie Walden, and Mr. Howard May, and the accompaniments played upon the organ and pianoforte by Lady Kathleen Cairns and Mr. Percy Ramsey. To the second part of the programme, which was miscellaneous, the choir contributed several pieces. Dr. Lemare gave the first of a proposed series of Pianoforte and Orchestral Recitals, at the Central Hall, on the 24th ult. The interesting character of these Recitals, at which pupils of the Concert-giver appear as the soloists, will be gathered from the programme on the occasion in question, which included Mendelssohn's Pianoforte Concerto in G minor (Op. 25) and the first part of Schumann's Concerto (Op. 54). The orchestra consisted of members of the Bournemouth Festival band, led by Signor Bertoncini; and variety was given to the programme by songs sung by Miss Ridout and Mr. Vincent Figgins. Performances of Stainer's "Crucifixion" and Mendelssohn's 26th Psalm were given at St. Aldhelm's Church, Branksome, on the 5th and 6th ult., under the direction of Mr. T. A. Aldridge. Madame Albani, supported by Miss Clara Butt, Miss Beatrice Langley, Mr. Charles Chiley, Signor Foli, and Signor Tito Mattei, appeared at a morning Concert given on the 8th ult., at the Bournemouth Theatre and Opera House.—Mr. Charles Fletcher gave his annual Concert, on March 30, before a large and enthusiastic audience. The most important pieces in the programme were the "Kreutzer" Sonata, of which a splendid rendering was given by Miss Janotha and the Concert-giver; Böhm's Nordische Romanza for violoncello, rendered by Miss Maud Fletcher; and Bach's Concerto for two violins, contributed by Mr. Fletcher and Miss D. Massingberd. Assistance was also given by a string orchestra, in which no less than sixty-five of Mr. Fletcher's pupils took part, and songs were effectively sung by Miss Massingberd, Miss Fenwich, and Mr. May.

The sacred cantata "Gethsemane," by C. Lee Williams, formed the chief part of the programme submitted by the Poole Musical Association on the 3rd ult., and a very good performance was secured, under the bâton of Mr. Gerald Lee. The solos were taken by Mrs. Cadman, Miss Bessie Legge, Mr. Lee, and Mr. Norman Kendall, the accompaniments being played by Mrs. Gerald Lee (pianoforte) and Miss Beament (organ).

A performance of "The Messiah" in the Town Hall, Portsmouth, was given on Good Friday by the Temperance Choral Union, under the able leadership of Mr. W. E. Green. The principals were Madame Albu, Miss Maud Baker, Mr. J. Probert, and Mr. R. Grice; the orchestra being supplied by the Royal Marine Light Infantry Band, and the choruses being admirably sung by the choir.

MUSIC IN YORKSHIRE.

(FROM OUR OWN CORRESPONDENT.)

EASTER always marks the termination of the musical season in Yorkshire, and it is only the circumstance of the festival falling unusually late that affords anything to be chronicled since our last record of Yorkshire music. Two very interesting Chamber Concerts, given by Mr. C. Rawdon Briggs, on March 25 and the 1st ult., have been the only musical events in Leeds of any artistic value during the past month. Mr. Briggs, a graduate of the Joachim school, who for some time past has been settled in Manchester, included in his programmes Schubert's Quartet in A minor, Dvorák's Pianoforte Quintet in A, and Quartets by Schumann (in F) and Mendelssohn (in E minor). He was assisted by Messrs. Bridge, Holme, and Bucknall, with Miss Eisele as pianist, a quintet of artists whose youthfulness was shown in the enthusiasm and earnestness of their performance. Dvorák's Terzetto in C (Op. 74) for two violins and viola was played at the second Concert, for the first time in Leeds, and proved a highly interesting novelty. On March 27 the Huddersfield Subscription Concerts came to an end with a "Recital" of the "Bohemian Girl"—a rather ignominious termination to a season that has included Concerts by Richter's, Hallé's, and Henschel's orchestras. The soloists were Madame Fanny Moody, Madame Adelaide Mullen, Mr. John Child, Mr. Friend Haigh, and Mr. Charles Manners. The choruses were sung by the Huddersfield Glee and Madrigal Society, whose Conductor, Mr. J. E. Ibeson, directed the performance. The annual Concert at Leeds, in aid of the Railway Servants' Charities, which took place on March 28, deserves passing mention. A popular but inoffensive programme was supplied by a number of local musicians: Miss Lily Pearce, Miss Enid Grimshaw, Messrs. Hodson and Gordon Heller being the vocalists; Miss K. Brigstocke and Mr. B. Johnson the pianists; and the Leeds Lyric Quartet singing glees, humorous and otherwise. On the 10th ult. Dr. C. L. Williams's cantata "Gethsemane" formed the subject of a special Passiontide service at the Leeds Parish Church. Dr. Williams came over to conduct, and the performance was, on the whole, well worthy of the Parish Church traditions. The principal parts were taken by Mrs. Nunns, Miss Edna Thornton, and Messrs. Child and Browning, the last two being members of the regular choir. Mr. Alfred Benton was the organist. On March 29 the Bradford Festival Choral Society, under the conductorship of Mr. W. H. Garland, gave a Concert of more than usual interest. Verdi's Requiem took up the first part of the programme. Of the soloists—Madame Duma, Miss Meisslinger, Messrs. Iver McKay and Bisham—the last-named was the only one who could be considered completely satisfactory. The chorus sang admirably, and the efficiency of the Bradford Permanent Orchestra was shown by its careful performance of the accompaniment, though it proved more at home in the "Tannhäuser" Overture, played in the second part of the Concert under its own Conductor, Mr. W. B. Sewell. On the 2nd ult. the Keighley Musical Union gave a Concert, at which was combined the first part of Mendelssohn's "St. Paul" with Sir John Stainer's "St. Mary Magdalen." The principal vocalists were Madame Marie Anderson, Madame Stoddart, Messrs. T. Barlow and A. S. Kinnell; Mr. Arthur Burnley being the Conductor. There was a large audience, with whom a local critic falls foul on the score that their "indications of approval were kept somewhat too decorously under restraint until each composition had been carried to a conclusion." It might have been thought that this approached closely to a virtue. On the same evening "St. Paul"—in this case the whole work—was given by the York Musical Society, under Dr. Naylor's conductorship. Madame Bertha Moore, Miss Jeanie Rankin, Messrs. Branscombe and David Hughes formed a thoroughly satisfactory quartet of soloists. The band was better than usual, and the chorus is considered to have shown progress, though a still greater attention to the niceties of expression would be desirable. York has been more than usually busy in musical matters, for on the 4th ult. Mr. Paderewski gave a Pianoforte Recital in the Festival Concert Room, and on March 30 the York Musical Union gave an interesting Concert of chamber music, Mr. Willy Hess being the violinist, Mr. Leonard Borwick the pianist, and Mrs. Burrell the vocalist. The "Kreutzer" Sonata, of which a particularly fine performance was given, and Brahms's Violin Sonata in D (Op. 100) were the chief things in the programme. On the 2nd ult. Mr. Gilbert Jackson, a local tenor vocalist, gave a Ballad Concert at Leeds. Miss Annie Cooke was the pianist and Mr. Staniland Hall played some flute solos very ably. On the 3rd ult. the Middlesbrough Musical Union gave a Concert, the first part of which was occupied with Mendelssohn's "Hymn of Praise." Miss Maggie Davies, Miss Kate Lynn, and Mr. Edward Lloyd were the principals. Mr. Kilburn, who conducted, appeared in the second half of the Concert in the capacity of composer, his setting of the 137th Psalm, "By the waters of Babylon," for chorus and orchestra, being given with very marked success. The Society has recently been doing honour to its two honorary secretaries, Messrs. Hood and Hornung, to whose labours during the twelve years of the Society's existence much of its success is owing, and an interesting "Record of twelve years' work," with programmes of all the concerts and portraits of the chief officials of the Society, has been published. The artistic enterprise shown in these programmes—which include many works that were novelties at the time of their performance—is no doubt attributable to the able amateur who has been the honorary conductor of the Society from the beginning. "Elijah" was given on Easter Monday by the Scarborough Choral Union, under Mr. A. M. Richardson's conductorship. The principals were Madame Eugenia Morgan, Miss Jessie King, Mr. Charles Ellison, and Mr. W. H. Burgon. At Hull, on the 9th ult., a juvenile prodigy was introduced to the public, in the shape of a young pianist, still in her ninth year. Miss Ethel Liggins, who is a pupil of Mrs. Russell Starr, played from memory a programme of no less than twenty-four short pieces with an ease and a finish remarkable in so young a player. Under judicious guidance she should become an accomplished artist.

MUSIC IN MONTREAL.

(FROM OUR OWN CORRESPONDENT.)

THE sixth annual Festival of the Philharmonic Society took place on the 2nd, 3rd, and 4th ult. The works performed were Mendelssohn's "Elijah," Wagner's "Flying Dutchman," and Saint-Saëns's "Samson and Delilah," and, on the afternoon of the third day, a miscellaneous selection of orchestral and vocal pieces. This was the fourth occasion on which "Elijah" had been given by this Society, and it showed a great advance on all previous performances. The soloists were Mrs. Elene Eaton, Madame Carl Alves, Mr. W. H. Rieger, and Mr. Watkin Mills. These artists were assisted in the double quartets by Miss Ella Walker, Miss Maud Burdette, Mr. E. Lebel, and Mr. A. K. Fisk—all of Montreal. The Society's chorus has always excelled in this work, but on this occasion their singing was exceptionally excellent, and their volume of tone in the great numbers, such as "Be not afraid," was magnificent.

The performance of "The Flying Dutchman" was very successful. Madame Emma Juch made a charming Senta, and Miss Maud Burdette sang the somewhat difficult music of Mary with accuracy and intelligence. Mr. Heinrich Meyn was excellent as Van der Decken, and Mr. W. H. Clarke's heavy and mellow bass voice was exactly suited to Daland. The women's chorus in the second act was beautifully rendered, and the male choruses were mostly very well done.

The novelty of the Festival was "Samson and Delilah," performed on this occasion for the first time in Canada. Madame Alves's name is associated in America with the rôle of Delilah. She possesses the great range of voice required for the part, and has remarkable dramatic power. Mr. Rieger sang the part of Samson very acceptably, but his voice is not strong enough to do full justice to it. He was far more effective in the third act, where Samson, shorn of strength and bereft of sight, is bewailing his sin, than in the first act, where he is inciting his followers to fight. Mr. Meyn, in the High Priest, had a part eminently suited to his high baritone voice, and Mr. Cunningham, of Montreal, sang the parts of Abimelech and the Old Hebrew very well. The chorus singing in this work reached the high-water mark of the Society's efforts. The volume of tone from all parts was excellent and all sang with confidence. The Boston Festival Orchestra of forty men, supplemented by sixteen men from Montreal, formed an excellent band of musicians, the equal of which the Society has never hitherto been able to engage. The attendance was large at all the Concerts.

The tenth and last Concert of the Montreal Symphony Orchestra season by this organization was given on March 22 to a crowded house. The programme was a very interesting one, containing some of the favourite numbers of preceding Concerts, and the work of the orchestra was really excellent. The numbers which excited most interest were the "Bal Costumé," Rubinstein; the Andante from Beethoven's C minor Symphony, and the Overture to "Tannhäuser," by Wagner. These Concerts have been very well patronised, and an effort will be made to place the orchestra on a permanent basis.

MUSIC IN PARIS.

(FROM OUR OWN CORRESPONDENT.)

AT the Opéra the rehearsals of "Tannhäuser" are in full swing. It is not, however, likely to be produced before the middle of May. It is probable that "Aida" and "Hamlet" will succeed "Tannhäuser." On the 1st ult., at the Opéra Comique, the first performance of "Vivandière," a comic opera in three acts, by M. Henri Cain, the music composed by Benjamin Godard, took place. The recent death of this young composer had disposed the public to anticipate the work with favour, and its success was very marked. Certainly no one will reproach Godard for having clung to Wagnerian ideas. His score seems to have been written with the sole idea of success. Every variety of style is to be found in it: lightness, gaiety, dramatic effect; and each is treated with equal certainty of touch. If success justifies everything, we must overlook certain banalities in the melodic structure. The story takes place at the conclusion of the wars of the Vendée, and numerous military scenes are skillfully introduced. Old songs, such as the "Chant du départ," are also heard. We must not omit to mention the skill with which M. Paul Vidal has completed the orchestration of this work, and also some recitatives which the author was unable to finish before his death. Madame Delna displays great artistic power as the Vivandière, and M. Fugère also deserves mention. Madame Calvé is beginning to rehearse "Guernica," an opera, by MM. Gailhard and Ghensi, the music by M. Paul Vidal. It will probably be produced next month. M. Jahyer, secretary of the Opéra Comique, has become director of the Municipal Theatre of Nantes.

A new theatrical enterprise has just been started, under the title of Théâtre Mondain (Académie lyrique et dramatique d'emulation). The productions take place in a small hall called "Cité d'Antin," but it is proposed to enlarge the sphere of operations in September. This theatre, intended to facilitate the début of young authors, may one day become the New Lyric.

On March 29 the first performance of the following works took place: "La Redingote grise," in one act, by MM. Lénéka and Bernède, the music by M. le Rey; "L'Ermite," in one act, by M. Durocher, the music by M. Letourneur; and lastly, "Le Capitaine Rolland," in two acts, by M. Armand Lafrique, music by M. Gregh. Neither of these works displays any great talent. M. le Rey, however, understands writing for the stage and has facility of melody.

The Conservatoire Concert, on March 31, included the ballet airs with chorus of "Prince Igor," by Borodine. This music is full of charm and originality, and the orchestration is very brilliant.

The Lamoureux Concert of March 24 possessed special interest; entirely devoted to Wagner's works, it was followed by a Lecture by M. Catulle Mendès, who has always, as is well known, been an ardent Wagnerian. At the Concert of March 31 Madame Lilli Lehmann achieved a remarkable success with Schubert's "Margarite" and the "Roi des Aulnes." She was again heard at the attractive Concert which took place on the 12th ult., with M. Kalisch, who distinguished himself in different pieces by Wagner.

M. Colonne devoted his Concert, on the 12th ult., to Berlioz's "L'enfance du Christ" and "Requiem," with selections from "Parsifal."

On Good Friday, Masses, including Gounod's "Messe de St. Cécile," were performed in twenty of the principal churches. The Seminary of St. Gervais performed the "Messe du Pape Marcel."

Among the numerous Chamber Concerts of the last month we must reserve a special place for those given by MM. Pugno and Marsick, assisted by M. André Hekking, a violoncellist of exceptional talent from Bordeaux, and

M. Loeb, another talented violoncellist. Apart from the well-known works of Beethoven, Saint-Saëns, Schumann, Brahms, and Mendelssohn, these excellent artists, at the Concert of March 25, took part in a Trio (Op. 45) by M. Luzzato, a work which has not much variety, but is melodious; a second Sonata by Bischof (for violin), which is fairly brilliant, was also performed.

MM. Diémer, Delsart, &c., have founded the "Société des Instruments anciens," and have given three Concerts. At that which took place on March 30 we may mention a Concerto for the hurdy-gurdy, by Naudot (1730), played by M. Grillet. At the Concert of the 10th ult. the "Fantaisie en echo," by Marais, for three violas, and the "Forêt," by Rameau, for hurdy-gurdy and harpsichord, were played. The last two Concerts of the Parent Quartet were devoted to Brahms.

During Holy Week the singers of St. Gervais performed a Mass by the English composer Byrd.

Madame Marchesi has just celebrated, at her house in the Rue Jouffroy, the fortieth anniversary of the commencement of her singularly successful teaching activity, exercised in the first instance in the vocal professorship at the Viennese Conservatorium, and continued upon her removal, some few years since, to the French capital. A number of operatic excerpts, culminating in the entire performance of M. Massenet's charming opera "Le Portrait de Manon" (under the direction of the composer), formed the chief features in the proceedings, which were listened to with sympathetic interest by a numerous and representative concourse of spectators.

The first of the four annual gratuitous performances took place recently at the Opéra, the work chosen for the occasion being Mdlle. Holmés's "La Montagne Noire," which proved to be very acceptable to the popular audience.

The members of the Society "pour la défense des droits de la femme" have addressed a note to the Préfet de la Seine, suggesting that the name of Albani should be given to one of the streets or squares of the capital, in memory of the great prima donna and benefactress to French charitable institutions.

The libretto of "Don Procopio," the newly discovered early opera by Bizet, has been placed in the hands of M. Louis Gallet, with a view to its adaptation and the prospective performance of the work here.

A NEWLY-FORMED German choir, as yet unnamed, made a very successful début at the Public Baths, Dartmouth Road, Forest Hill, on the 6th ult. Its Conductor is Mr. Th. Wendt, a young musician who brings unmistakable aptitude and a great deal of well-directed enthusiasm to his task. Its maiden effort was modestly restricted to Mendelssohn's "Morgengebet" and "Deutschland," a very beautiful part-song by A. Krug, "O wehr es nicht" (Op. 32, No. 1), and Schumann's ever-fresh "Zigeunerleben" (Gipsy Life), the last-named having been cleverly provided by the Conductor with parts for tambourine, triangle, and cymbals, whereby a charming effect of "local colour" was obtained by the simplest means. The singing showed the result of careful training, refinement and accuracy being conspicuous features of the performance. In E. Lassen's "Wieder möcht ich dir begegnen" and Meyer Helmund's "Mädchenlied," Fräulein Fanny Braselmann displayed a sympathetic, well-trained voice and much charm of style; while her intonation and enunciation were exceptionally good. Fräulein Rosy Welti sang songs by Schumann and Schubert very tastefully, while Herr H. Lorenz, in Jensen's "Ausfahrt" and Brahms's "Von ewiger Liebe," and Herren R. Ernst and Th. Wendt in some very original "Valse Romantiques" for two pianofortes, by E. Chabrier, contributed much to the enjoyment of the audience. Wagner's "Kaisermarsch," in a pianoforte quartet (eight hands) arrangement, opened the Concert; but the dismal and most inappropriate marcia funebre tempo adopted throughout made us doubt whether the performers were really Germans.

The National Theatre has once more become the temporary home of English opera—or, to speak by the card, opera in English—Sir Augustus Harris having begun a series of performances, on the 13th ult., at cheap prices.

No "stars" of the first magnitude were announced, so that we found legitimate cause for satisfaction in the crowded state of the house when such well-known works as "Faust," "Carmen," "Maritana," "The Bohemian Girl," "Cavalleria," and "Pagliacci" were offered as the attractions. The company assembled by Sir Augustus Harris includes Mesdames Fanny Moody, Esther Palliser, Olitzka, Dagmar, Florence Monteith, Jessie Gorton (who made a successful début as Lazarillo); and Messrs. Brozel, John Child, J. O'Mara, Harrison Brockbank, Richard Green, Charles Manners, and Frangcon-Davies. Mr. Brozel, who, it will be remembered, is a young Russian who received his training at the Royal Academy of Music, played and sang the difficult part of Don José in "Carmen" with great intelligence and dramatic power, and repeated his success in "Pagliacci." Mr. J. M. Glover and Signor Seppilli share the duties of Conductor between them, the former directing the English, the latter the foreign works. The mise-en-scène, chorus, and orchestra are all excellent.

MR. JULIAN PASCAL obtained the assistance of several eminent artists at his Concert at the Hampstead Conservatoire, on the 5th ult. The presence of M. Emile Sauret led to the effective performance, with Mr. Pascal, of one of Beethoven's sonatas for pianoforte and violin, the first-named appearing later as a soloist with Bruch's "Romance" and Wieniawski's "Sielanka," each played with the utmost finish. The pianist's neat and expressive execution was manifested in three Chopin pieces. Other instrumental solos were contributed by Herr Alfred Gallein on the violoncello. Miss Ella Russell gave with much charm Leoni's "The Two Poets" and Mackenzie's "The Two Angels." Mr. Forrest Scott (a baritone with an excellent voice and style) was successful in Sullivan's "Thou'rt passing hence," and Mr. J. O'Shaughnessy also rendered vocal pieces in a pleasing manner. Mr. Charles Fry recited "The Bells," to Mr. Stanley Hawley's telling musical accompaniment, with so much effect that a supplementary piece was demanded, when he responded with Whyte Melville's "Riding thro' the Broom," with the same composer's music.

THE number of performances on Good Friday of sacred music of the highest class was unprecedented, and notwithstanding the fineness of the weather the masses assembled in huge force everywhere—that is to say, in all districts where an edifying performance was given. It is said that over 11,000 persons were in the Albert Hall in the evening, when Sir Joseph Barnby conducted an abbreviated version of "The Messiah." The Queen's Hall was full in the afternoon, Gounod's "Redemption" being an irresistible attraction; and there was also a large attendance in the evening, when a high-class miscellaneous programme was provided. The Crystal Palace Concert, in which the audience join so heartily in the hymns, was as well attended as ever; and the only falling off noticeable was in St. James's Hall, where Rossini's "Stabat Mater" and "Gems from the Oratorios" were given. May we attribute this to the absence of an orchestra? Anyway, the fact was conclusive that the appreciation of music, refining and elevating in its tendency, is increasing year by year, and it is one to be noted with joy and rejoicing.

THE first Concert of the combined Brookfield Choral and Orchestral Societies was given at Stanley Hall, Junction Road, on the 18th ult., when Mendelssohn's "Athalie" was the chief feature in the programme. The choruses were given with precision and effect, and the orchestra came through a difficult task with credit to itself and its able Conductor, Mr. W. A. Gardner. The orchestra was heard to still more advantage in Mendelssohn's Concerto in G minor, the pianoforte part of which was rendered with admirable executive skill by Miss Jessie Reeve, a youthful pupil of the Conductor. The soloists were Mesdames Jessie Strathearn, Lee, and Florence Croft, and Mr. Maurice Aubrey. Mr. Charles Fry, who recited the verses in "Athalie," also gave a dramatic rendering of "The Bells," with Stanley Hawley's music, in which he was most efficiently accompanied by Mr. Gardner, under whose energetic direction the Concert was brought to a successful issue.

MR. ALGERNON ASHTON calls attention to the neglected appearance of the late Mr. Thomas Wingham's grave in Kensal Green Cemetery. He writes: "As I was one of those who attended the funeral of the deceased musician, I remember the exact spot where his remains are interred, otherwise it would be impossible to distinguish the grave, there being no tombstone, no flower-bed, in fact, only a wretched looking mound of earth, which scarcely rises above the level of the ground. Why could not a small portion of the fund now being collected for the purpose of founding a Scholarship at the Guildhall School of Music in memory of Thomas Wingham be devoted to the erection of a simple but fitting memorial on the grave of this sterling musician and truly good man?" We cordially endorse Mr. Ashton's suggestion, and have no doubt it will meet with ready acceptance.

AN attractive Concert was given by Miss Mabel Chaplin, who plays remarkably well on the violoncello, an instrument which appears to be growing in popularity with lady executants, on March 28, at the Queen's Hall. She executed with praiseworthy taste and executive facility Boccherini's tuneful Sonata in A—the only work by the composer, who was styled the wife of Haydn, which survives—and pieces by Herr Popper. Mr. Emil Sauer, however, was probably in the main responsible for the large attendance, and the pianist, who has won popularity with the English public so quickly, was heard at his best in Chopin's Sonata in B minor (Op. 59). Miss Kate Chaplin (a capable violinist), Miss Thudichum, Miss Agnes Wilson, and Mr. Andrew Black lent highly effective aid in the performance.

MISS ADA BODEN's Concert at the Salle Erard, on the 6th ult., was a decided success. This intelligent pianist selected for solo display Bach's "Prémable," Schumann's "Grillen," and Chaminade's "Air de Ballet" (a specially meritorious performance), and joined Mr. Frederick Frederiksen, the violinist, in Grieg's Sonata in F. A couple of movements from Max Bruch's Concerto in G minor and some lighter pieces were Mr. Frederiksen's solo essays. The beautiful voice and artistic method of Mrs. Creser were particularly evinced in the two elegant songs, "Heart of me" and "The Thrush," composed by Dr. Creser, by whom she was accompanied. The other vocalists were Miss Helen E. Buckley and Mr. John Morley.

ON the 2nd ult. a Concert was given by the St. Peter's Choral Society, in the St. Peter's Hall, Brockley, when Sir Arthur Sullivan's "The Martyr of Antioch," was performed, under the direction of Dr. C. J. Frost. The chorus did their work admirably. The principal parts were allotted to Miss Ada Loaring (Margarita), Miss Susetta Fenn (Julia), Mr. Sinclair Dunn (Olybius), Mr. Dan Price (Callias), Mr. Paul England (Fabius), and these all acquitted themselves satisfactorily. The accompaniments were ably played by a professional string band, led by Mr. Richardson; while Mr. J. Curran and Mr. A. J. Sindall did good service at the pianoforte and harmonium respectively. The harp obbligato for Margarita's recitative and hymn was played by Mr. E. Deane.

THE Amateur Orchestral Society in connection with the Imperial Institute concluded, on March 27, a season which has been remarkable for the progress in efficiency made by its members, and which reflects the greatest credit on the Conductor, Mr. Randegger. The advance made in executive power was well shown by the performance of Bizet's vivacious Suite "Roma," the difficulties of which were met in a commendable manner. Interesting features of the Concert were the first performance of an effective and spirited "Marche Asiatique," written by Mr. Louis d'Egville, the able leader of the orchestra; and the début in London of Mr. Alberto Randegger, a young violinist of great promise.

THE Institute Choir and Orchestra connected with the Goldsmiths' Company's Institute at New Cross gave a performance of Costa's "Eli," on the 6th ult. The solos were excellently sung by Miss Florence Monk, Master Leonard Tudgay, Mr. F. C. Bevan (Eli), Mr. Thomas Kempton (Man of God), and Mr. Edward Branscombe (Elkanah), the last-named carrying off the honours of the evening. The orchestra did its work excellently, and the choir did good service on the whole. Dr. C. J. Frost conducted with care and skill. The last of the present series of Organ Recitals at the Goldsmiths' Institute, New Cross, was given by Dr. C. J. Frost, on the 25th ult.

THE Musical Artists' Society gave a Concert at St. Martin's Town Hall, on the 22nd ult., when three new works were performed. The four "Meditations" for clarinet and pianoforte, by Mr. R. H. Walthew, display originality of thought and skilful workmanship, and were admirably played by the composer and Mr. J. Egerton. A Trio by Miss E. Swepstone—who, although a pleasing writer, shows at present want of experience—and two songs by Mr. George Gear, sung by Miss Ruthven, completed the novelties. Brahms's Quartet in A minor and Dvorák's Quartet in E flat were performed by the Shinner Quartet, and Miss Louie Hunt also sang.

THE sixteenth Annual Report, just issued, of Miss Helen Kenway's admirable "Orphan School and Benevolent Fund for Musicians," shows that, after paying a deficiency of over £52 on last year's account, only a small deficit balance now remains; but funds are still urgently required, as Miss Kenway has to find another house for her school, thus incurring expenses of removal and extra furniture, and the duties of management devolving on Miss Kenway will prevent her deriving her own income from private tuition as she has hitherto done. No appeal should be necessary to call forth a sympathetic response from the generous-minded on behalf of so excellent an institution.

MISS ADELINA DE LARA gave the third and last of her Pianoforte Recitals at the Steinway Hall, on the 10th ult. Schumann's Andante and Variations for the curious and not altogether effective combination of two pianofortes, two violoncellos, and horn was marked "first time in England." But this is scarcely correct, as the work was given by the Musical Guild in the Kensington Town Hall some time since. The entertainment resolved itself into a Chamber Concert, other pieces being Brahms's Pianoforte Quartet in A (Op. 26) and Dvorák's "Dumky" Pianoforte Trio. Next to Miss de Lara, the best executant of the afternoon was certainly Miss Esther Palliser.

THE annual performance in St. Paul's Cathedral, on the 9th ult., of the condensed version of Bach's Passion Music according to the text of St. Matthew was, if possible, more impressive than on any former occasion. As usual, the choir was increased to about 300 voices, the band, led by Mr. G. H. Betjemann (who excellently played the violin obligatos), numbered about fifty, and the movable organ supplemented the grand instrument played by Mr. Hodge. The favour accorded to this "Passion" Music is one of the healthiest indications of musical progress that could be furnished. Mr. F. Walker was again at the pianoforte, and Dr. Martin conducted.

MISS FANNY DAVIES's Pianoforte Recital, at the Hampstead Conservatoire, on March 30, served to demonstrate this true artist's command of varying styles. The most important work was Beethoven's Sonata (Op. 101), the rendering of which was marked by all Miss Davies's well-known fervour, judgment, and accuracy. Bach was represented by a Fugue in A minor, and there were characteristic examples of Schumann, Chopin, Mendelssohn, and Brahms. In these and other pieces the executant firmly held the attention of the audience, and was enthusiastically complimented whenever opportunity offered.

A MONTH or two ago we recorded a series of performances of Sullivan's "Gondoliers," given entirely by the boys of the Grocers' Company's School at Hackney. We now have to chronicle a performance of "Elijah," given by the same school—of course with the assistance, in this instance, of adult tenors and basses and instrumentalists, and adult tenor and bass soloists. The performance was a remarkably good one, going from beginning to end without a hitch. Masters H. A. Knott (soprano) and T. Rumbal (alto) were the boy soloists. There was a full and efficient orchestra. Mr. Ernest Newton conducted.

MISS ROSA LEO's third Vocal Recital, given on March 30, at Steinway Hall, was not less attractive than its predecessors. She introduced to public notice Sir Joseph Barnby's "My Sweet," a tender and sympathetic setting of Tennyson's poem, and admirably interpreted it. Miss Leo also did justice to songs by Messrs. F. H. Cowen and Ernest Walker, besides repeating her recitation of the English translation of Maeterlinck's "Intérieur." Mr. Johannes Wolff played with his accustomed effect violin solos by Sgambati, Godard, and Ries, and Mr. Wilfred Bendall was the accompanist.

THE competition for the South Province of Victoria Scholarship connected with the Royal College of Music, and founded by the Hon. Sir William Clarke, for natives of Victoria, took place recently at Melbourne, and resulted in the election of Arthur E. H. Nickson (organ). The Montreal scholarship, founded at the instance of the Princess Louise, has also been competed for at Montreal, and the examiners selected Beatrice La Palme (violin). These two scholarships are tenable for three years, and provide musical education and maintenance during the College terms.

THE Lenten Services at St. Luke's, Westbourne Park, terminated with a performance of Stainer's "Crucifixion" on Sunday evening, the 7th ult., and Gaul's "Passion Music" on Good Friday evening. The solos were sung by Masters Swain and Jarvis and Messrs. Pitman, Knight, and George Trotman. The excellent rendering of the accompaniments by Mr. G. E. Bambridge were an important feature at each service. On Easter Sunday Tours's Service in F and Vincent's Anthem, "Very early in the morning," were sung.

MISS FLORENCE MAY gave her fifth and last Pianoforte Recital at the Queen's Hall, on March 29, with an interesting programme, including some antiquarian pieces by J. Agrell, Maurice Greene, Domenico Scarlatti, and three from the Fitzwilliam Virginal Book, by a composer whose name is not known. She also played Mendelssohn's Fantasia in F sharp minor (Op. 28), sometimes known as the "Scotch" Fantasia, and Schumann's Carnaval. Miss May's touch is rather hard, but she is a very intelligent artist.

At St. Joseph's Retreat, on Good Friday, Rossini's "Stabat Mater" was sung, with full orchestra. Mr. Volanti Armitage, the Director of Music and Organist, presided at the grand organ, and the Conductor was Mr. Thomas Seadon. On Easter Sunday, at the morning service, Haydn's "Imperial" Mass was given, and in the evening the Offertory was "The heavens are telling," and a new "O Salutaris," by Mr. Volanti Armitage, was sung by Mr. Joseph O'Shaughnessy (violin obligato, Mr. Geo. Leipold), accompanied by the composer.

On March 28 Mr. Henschel gave his annual Wagner Concert, at St. James's Hall, the London Symphony Orchestra being increased to one hundred performers by accessions from the Scottish Orchestra. Madame Sapiro and Mr. Henschel sang, and the selections comprised extracts from "Rienzi," "The Flying Dutchman," "Tannhäuser," "Lohengrin," "Die Meistersinger," "Tristan," "Die Walküre," "Götterdämmerung," and "Parsifal." There was a large and highly appreciative audience.

AN Orchestral Concert by the students of the Royal Academy of Music was given at St. James's Hall, on Friday afternoon, the 5th ult. The first important piece in the programme was Saint-Saëns's effective Violin Concerto in B minor, excellently played by Miss Gertrude Collins; and much promise was displayed by Miss Gertrude Peppercorn and Miss Sybil Palliser (pianists), Miss Beatrice Stanley Lucas (soprano), and Mr. Michael Donnewell (flautist).

THE work selected for performance this year at the Crystal Palace on Handel Festival scale is Mendelssohn's "Hymn of Praise," which will be given on Saturday, June 22. The choir and orchestra, which will as usual be under the direction of Mr. August Manns, will number 3,000. Mr. Walter W. Hedgcock will preside at the organ, and the solo music will be sung by Madame Albani, Madame Clara Samuelli, and Mr. Edward Lloyd.

A CONTRACT has been entered into between Sir Somers Vane, who is acting on behalf of several noblemen and gentlemen, and Herr Eduard Strauss, the Imperial and Royal Music Director to the Austro-Hungarian Court, for the appearance of the Strauss Orchestra during the London season. Herr Strauss is to conduct the orchestra, which, in addition to its public performances, is to be available for a few Subscription Concerts in some of the leading provincial towns and also for private engagements.

SULLIVAN'S Oratorio "The Prodigal Son" was given at St. James's, the Parish Church of Paddington, on Sunday, March 31, as the afternoon service, when the solos were well rendered by Miss Gertrude Izard, Miss Florence Hoare, Mr. Gilbert Denis, and Mr. Fredk. Winton. Sir John Stainer's "The Crucifixion" was performed on Good Friday afternoon. On both occasions Mr. Henry J. B. Dart presided at the organ.

STAINER'S "Crucifixion" was sung at Hanover Church, Regent Street, on Wednesday, the 3rd ult., and on the following Sunday afternoon. The choruses were sung with much expression, while the solo work was undertaken in a very creditable manner by Messrs. Dawes, Barker, Cope, Evans, and Pratley, all of them members of the choir. Mr. David J. Thomas, the Organist and Choirmaster, presided at the organ.

THE yearly Dinner of the Westminster Orchestral Society was held on Monday, March 25, at the Holborn Restaurant. Sir Benjamin Baker took the chair, and the company included a number of ladies and gentlemen well known in the musical world. The programme of music played during the evening included a performance by the Misses Grimson of the Mendelssohn Trio in D minor for pianoforte, violin, and violoncello.

On the 10th ult. Gaul's Passion Music was sung at St. Peter's Church, Brockley, by the regular choir of fifty voices, accompanied by a select orchestra of thirty performers, under the conductorship of Dr. C. J. Frost, the Organist and Choirmaster of the Church. Mr. H. A. Gisby ably presided at the organ. Vinning's Passion according to St. John was also sung at the same church, on Good Friday evening, accompanied on the organ by Dr. Frost.

On March 27 the Kyrle Choir, under the direction of Mr. F. A. W. Docker, gave a selection from Bach's Passion Music ("St. John"), followed by Rossini's "Stabat Mater," at St. John's, Stratford. The soloists were Miss Cecilia Gray, Miss Rina Robinson, Mr. John Probert, Mr. Frederick Williams, Mr. Albert Orme, and Mr. Swabey Russell. Dr. Turpin accompanied on the organ.

THE Burgon Opera Recital Company will commence a tour of sixteen weeks at Southsea on June 17. The Company will include Madame Eugénie Morgan, Miss Emily Rasey, Mr. Charles Ellison, Mr. W. H. Montgomery, Mr. Leslie Smith, and Mr. W. H. Burgon. Recitals from the following operas will be given on tour: "Cavalleria Rusticana," "Faust," "Maritana," "Pagliacci," "Bohemian Girl," "Philemon et Baucis," and "Cox and Box."

A SERIES of eight Pianoforte Recitals, notice of which must be held over till our next issue, was begun at Steinway Hall, on the 22nd ult., by Dr. Otto Neitzel, a pupil of Kullak and Liszt, who is also highly esteemed in Germany as a critic and musical littérateur. The programmes announced leave nothing to be desired on the score of excellence.

At St. Ethelburga's, Bishopsgate, on Easter Day, the special services included Gounod's "Messe Solennelle," Handel's "I know that my Redeemer liveth," Gounod's "Ave Verum," Gadsby's Magnificat and Nunc dimittis in C, Stainer's "They have taken away my Lord," and Halleujah Chorus ("Messiah"). The music was sung by the choir of the church with orchestral accompaniment.

MADAME LEHFELDT, one of the professors at the Guildhall School of Music, gave a Concert in the Queen's (Small) Hall on the 22nd ult., when she manifested her ability as a pianist by playing Mendelssohn's "Variations Sérieuses" (Op. 54) and pieces by Chopin and Brahms. After each she was warmly applauded. Mr. R. A. Lehfeldt (vocalist) and Mr. John Pitts (violinist) assisted.

THE members of the Lewisham Choral Society gave a very successful performance of Gounod's oratorio "The Redemption," under the conductorship of Mr. Frank Idle, on the 4th ult., at the Court Hill Schools, Lewisham. The soloists were Miss Amy Sargent, Miss Jessie Pate, Miss Hannah Jones, Mr. Chambers Coleman, and Mr. R. E. Miles.

A PERFORMANCE of Gaul's "Holy City" was given by the choir of St. Mary Woolnoth, Lombard Street, on March 27. The soloists were Messdames Nash, Judge, Essex, and Molson; Messrs. Gibson (senior and junior), Greir, and O'Kell. The Organist of St. Mary's (Mr. H. R. Essex) conducted, and Mr. W. Essex (Organist of St. Bartholomew's the Less, Smithfield) presided at the organ.

A COURSE of three Lectures, by Mr. Arnold Dolmetsch, on music and musical instruments of the sixteenth, seventeenth, and eighteenth centuries, with musical illustrations, the first of which was announced to take place on the 27th ult., at the Royal Institution, too late for notice this month, promises to be of unusual interest to all who value the musical expression of past ages.

MR. J. EDWARD FISHER gave a successful Concert at Brixton Hall, on the 9th ult., when he was assisted by Miss Isabel Thomson, Miss Edith Bird, Mr. Lloyd Chandos, Mr. Griffiths Percy, Mr. Leonard Johnson, and Mr. John Nash (vocalists); Miss Bella Gordon (violin), Mr. Ernest Matthews (violinello), Mr. C. Museburger and the Concert-giver (pianoforte), and Mr. Adrian Harley (reciter).

MISS HOLLAND'S Choir gave a Concert in St. Martin's Town Hall, on March 28, when Mr. Edward Elgar's cantata "The Black Knight" was performed. The work, which has been noticed in previous issues in our country news, was given with pianoforte accompaniment. Mr. Harrison Brockbank sang the solo part in an arrangement by Miss Holland of Howard Glover's "Tam o' Shanter."

ON Good Friday evening Sir John Stainer's "Crucifixion" was sung at St. Jude's Church, Bethnal Green. The solos were undertaken by Messrs. Marriott and Bailey, of Marylebone Parish Church; Mr. H. W. Reeves (Organist of the Church) presided at the organ, and Mr. J. Lawrence (Choirmaster) conducted.

ON Brahms's birthday (7th inst.) Mr. Bispham will give a Concert, consisting entirely of music by that composer, at St. James's Hall, when he will be assisted by Mrs. Henschel, Miss Agnes Janson, Mr. William Shakespeare, Miss Fanny Davies, Signor Arbos, Herr Paersch, Mr. Busby, and Mrs. Berzon.

ON the 8th ult. a Concert, in aid of the Children's Hospital, was given at the Surrey Street Music Hall, by Mr. Reuben Wood, assisted by pupils and friends. An orchestra of thirty performers gave a good rendering of Haydn's "Surprise" Symphony, and other pieces.

MR. SANTLEY proposes during the summer months to give instruction to a limited number of pupils in singing. Madame Marie Roze has also started a school for operatic and concert singing in the Rue de la Victoire, which has already proved very successful.

THE programme of the Royal Artillery Band Concert, announced for the 26th ult., too late for notice in our present issue, contained, among other works of special interest, Raff's "Lenore" Symphony and three movements from Mancinelli's Incidental music to "Cleopatra."

MADAME ALBANI will "create" the part of Edith in Mr. Cowen's new opera "Harold," which will be produced at Covent Garden this season. The libretto is by Sir E. Mallet, and the opera will be sung in English.

ON the 16th ult., at the Rectory, St. Anne's, Soho, the clergy and choir presented Mr. E. H. Thorne with a floor lamp and an illuminated address.

HUMPERDINCK's opera "Hänsel und Gretel" was transferred to the Savoy Theatre on Easter Tuesday, and reached its 100th performance in London on the 18th ult.

OBITUARY.

WE have to record the death, on March 25, in her seventy-sixth year, of Mrs. F. A. BRIDGE, a lady who, under her maiden name of Elizabeth Stirling, gained a considerable reputation as an organist and composer. A pupil of Edward Holmes, she was one of the first in the metropolis to play Bach's fugues, and nearly sixty years ago played before an audience of experts five pedal fugues, three pedal trios, and other pieces. In 1856 Miss Stirling competed for the degree of Mus. Bac. at Oxford University, being so far successful as to have her exercise—a setting for five-part chorus and orchestra of Psalm 130—passed by the examiner, her sex alone debarring her from taking the degree. The deceased lady was for a number of years organist of All Saints', Poplar, and, subsequently, for a period of twenty-two years, organist at St. Andrew's Undershaft, Leadenhall Street, a position which she resigned in 1880. As a composer, Miss Stirling produced a great number of pieces for the organ and other instruments, but she will probably be best remembered by her part-songs, one of which, "All among the barley," obtained extraordinary popularity.

ON the 2nd ult. there died, at his residence, Heath Lodge, Hanwell, WILLIAM EBSWORTH HILL, the well-known violin maker, of New Bond Street. He was the descendant of a long line of stringed instrument makers, who carried out the traditions of the famous schools of Brescia and Cremona, and whose establishment in London dates back nearly three centuries. The deceased contributed his full share to the fame won by his house for the excellence of its instruments, which he had the satisfaction of seeing acknowledged by the award of first prizes at the great world-exhibitions of Paris and elsewhere. Mr. Hill was in his seventy-eighth year.

WE record, with regret, the death, on the 11th ult., at Sparkhill, Birmingham, of Mrs. AMELIA BOYCE, better known to old Concert-goers as Miss Amelia Hill. She was a pupil of the Royal Academy of Music and, some fifty years ago, was a much appreciated singer at some of the leading Concert-institutions in the metropolis. She also gave successful concerts in the provinces, notably at Birmingham, where she eventually took up her residence and devoted herself with much success to the tuition of her art. The deceased lady, whose services were always freely rendered in the cause of charity, was in her seventy-fourth year.

SIMON SCHWAEDELÉ, an excellent violinist, and an artist of sterling merit, died last month at Strassburg, where he was born in 1818. He was a favourite pupil of Baillet, at the Paris Conservatoire, where he obtained a first prize, and for several years occupied the post of first violin at the Opéra. Returning to Strassburg in 1842, Schwaedélé, in association with Weber, Mayerhofer, and Oudshorn, founded the Society for Classical Chamber Music, which soon became an important feature in the musical life of the town. In 1867 he again went to the French capital, as professor of his instrument at the Collège de Vaugirard, and other institutions, and also resided for some years in a similar capacity at Nancy; finally retiring, in 1880, to the Convent of Saint-Charles, in the neighbourhood of his native Strassburg, where he employed his leisure in the vocal training of the children of the Orphanage connected with that religious establishment, a fresh field of activity in which he was entirely successful. Thus Schwaedélé rendered good service to his art to the last, and only a few days previous to his decease played his final violin solo in the chapel of the Convent, an "Ave Maria" by Rupès.

THE death is announced recently, at St. Petersburg, of PAUL PETERSEN, an accomplished pianist, pupil of Henselt, and much sought after as a teacher of the piano-forte. Upon the death of Henselt, he succeeded the latter in the important position of musical inspector of girls' schools in the Russian capital, he having also been for many years one of the most active directors of the Russian Musical Society. Not content, however, with a professional activity so varied, M. Petersen, in 1871, became the proprietor of the pianoforte factory established by Becker, and so improved the quality of his instruments that they were soon preferred to any other in Russian concert-rooms. The deceased musician was on terms of close friendship with Anton Rubinstein, with whom he has been a frequent representative of the Russian Empire on juries in connection with international exhibitions.

The death, on March 28, at Smichow, near Prague, of ADOLF POPELKA, merchant, should be recorded in these columns on account of the reverend care with which, as owner of the villa "Bertramka," where Mozart completed his "Don Giovanni," he preserved intact, as his father had done before him, the various points associated with that historical event. At the fountain in the grounds, where the master was wont to rest, Popelka had moreover erected a monument to his memory, and by his testamentary directions his heirs are enjoined to similarly preserve the place in the future. All honour to the art-loving merchant of Prague!

The death is announced, on the 10th ult., at Paris, of LÉON RICHAULT, the head of one of the oldest established and most important music publishing firms in the French capital. M. Richault, who was a highly esteemed personality in music circles, had only attained his fifty-fifth year.

We have also to record the following deaths:—

On March 20, at Leipzig, EDMUND STOLL, music publisher, aged seventy-six.

On March 17, at Vienna, CAMILLO WALZEL, who, under the pseudonym of ZELL, was a successful dramatic author, and, in co-operation with Genée, the librettist of a number of operettas, set to music by Strauss, Suppé, Millöcker, and others, aged sixty-seven. Walzel was also for some time co-director, with Jenner, of the Theater an der Wien.

On March 20, at Toulouse, ALOYS KUNC, professor at the Conservatoire, esteemed composer of church music, and founder of the important periodical Musica Sacra, aged thirty-three.

On March 26, at Berlin, WILHELM VALERIUS, excellent bassoon player, of the Royal orchestra.

On March 25, at Eilbeck, near Hamburg, PETER NOLDEN, at one time a highly popular operatic baritone, titular "Kammersänger" to the late Duke of Saxe-Coburg, aged eighty-four.

On March 29, at Paris, LEOPOLD DANOLA, excellent violinist, professor at the Conservatoire, aged seventy-two.

On the 5th ult., at Vienna, LUDWIG ROTTER, Court Capellmeister, organist, and meritorious composer of church music, aged eighty-five.

On the 5th ult., at Vienna, EMIL ROTTER, member of the Imperial orchestra and conductor of the Mozart Society, aged forty-seven.

On March 31, at Magdeburg, FRANZ SCHLOSSER, popular operatic singer.

On March 14, at Malters, near Lucerne, FRANZ XAVER HAMMER, organist, and able choral conductor, aged forty.

Recently, at Paris, ADOLPHE NIBELLE, member of the legal profession, composer of numerous operas and cantatas, aged sixty-nine.

On the 18th ult., at 1, Artesian Road, Bayswater, after a long illness, FRANZ BOSEN, teacher of singing.

CORRESPONDENCE.

"HÄNSEL UND GRETEL."

TO THE EDITOR OF "THE MUSICAL TIMES."

SIR,—The answers to my letter of last month in your valuable paper, by Messrs. Robin H. Legge and Mr. Gustav Ernest, induced me to communicate with Mr. Humperdinck directly on the subject, as, from my personal conversation with him, I had always been under the impression that the melodies in "Hänsel und Gretel" were all his own. Humperdinck replied as follows: "From the first setting, with dialogue, &c., of 'Hänsel und Gretel,' which you no doubt recollect, a few popular melodies have been retained, which I introduced to give the piece a 'local colouring'—as, for instance, 'Ein Männlein steht im Walde.' This and the 'two other ones' ('Suse, liebe Suse,' and the 'Children's jubilant Chorus,' p. 127, vocal score) had, of course, to undergo some slight changes for the sake of musical uniformity and embodiment into the opera. I intend shortly to publish an extensive report on this question in a German paper." This, of course, settles the question how far the melodies are his own and how far they are taken from existing folk-songs.

The remarks of the critics (with Hanslick at their head) have been a source of great annoyance to Humperdinck, and his complaints to his friends about the matter led me to the belief that all the melodies in "Hänsel und Gretel" were his own invention.—Yours truly,

E. VAN DER STRAETEN.

"THE MESSIAH" AT THE ALBERT HALL.

TO THE EDITOR OF "THE MUSICAL TIMES."

SIR,—Will you kindly allow me to draw attention to the very faulty arrangement which obtains in the Promenade of the Albert Hall. Unfortunately, I arrived late on Good Friday evening, and was told that no seats were available in any part of the Hall, and consequently was obliged to go up to the Promenade. Here between four and five thousand people were congested, some standing, while others constantly moved about or squatted on the floor. The Albert Hall was crowded, and after an hour or so the heat became most oppressive—I would not like to suggest the temperature—and although several ladies were taken out in a fainting condition, yet nothing was done to alter this fearful state of things. There are large glass skylights just overhead, and surely it might be possible to arrange some small ventilators that might be used occasionally, or at least during the interval.

On leaving the Hall I caught a severe cold, and I do not doubt that many others suffered in a similar manner.

With thanks, in anticipation, for inserting this letter,

I remain, Sir, yours, &c.,

MUSICUS.

[We feel sure the Council of the Royal Albert Hall will, on noting this complaint, at once take steps to remove its cause.—ED. M.T.]

MUSIC AND FOOTBALL.

TO THE EDITOR OF "THE MUSICAL TIMES."

SIR,—Will you or any of your intelligent readers kindly explain to me why the Crystal Palace Company paradoxically permit, without proper provision, an enormous crowd to witness a football match on the same day and at the same hour that they give one of their excellent Orchestral Concerts?

On Saturday, the 20th ult., I was one of the unhappy persons who attended the Concert—I was intending to say, as usual, but that would have been untrue, as, owing to the train being late, I only reached the Concert-room in time to hear the last bars of the first piece.

I am not sure that I was in the best possible condition, physically, mentally, or morally, to enjoy music of any kind, and I opine that it would take more than even Schubert in C, to say nothing of the magnificently rendered "Liebestod" and other items of the programme, to soothe the savage "beast," developed out of a passenger who had enjoyed for a full hour on a warm spring day the seventeenth portion of a first-class compartment of the London, Chatham and Dover Railway, and who, moreover, had endured the sufferings of a theatrical pitte—admirable from the football point of view—in the struggle to leave the railway platform. As an Englishman I have no aversion to sports, and when they offer, as they often do, an opportunity for the multitude to enjoy fresh air and sunshine, I would willingly make some sacrifice, if necessary; but was it necessary on this occasion to the extent I have indicated? I also am a believer in some parallelisms in Art, but for the life of me I cannot see the slightest parallel between "Association Football" and a high-class Concert. If, however, the idea occurs to anyone that the Crystal Palace Company wished to test the power of music over the ruder feelings, I beg to assure them that the experiment was wholly unsuccessful.—Truly yours,

P. H. NEWMAN.

MOZART'S REQUIEM.

TO THE EDITOR OF "THE MUSICAL TIMES."

SIR,—In reading lately some books about Mozart's Requiem and the Süssmayer question, I was struck by the absence of any argument founded upon the fact that the final movement is a repetition of the opening "Kyrie." Had Süssmayer been an unprincipled man, without any regard for his dead master, he had an excellent opportunity here of writing an independent final movement of his own. But he did not do so; he merely gave the opening "Kyrie" over again, note for note. If it be said that he was hurried by Count Walsegg, this argument tells also against his having had time to write a "Sanctus," "Benedictus," and "Agnus" of his own. On the whole, the fact of the repetition of the opening "Kyrie" seems to me a conclusive argument that Süssmayer was a conscientious man, who scrupulously confined himself to the oral instructions he got from Mozart, and to the fragmentary notes on bits of paper (the meaning of which he must have well known) handed to him by Frau Mozart.—Yours obediently,

H. W. L. HIME, Lieut.-Col.

"TALL v. SHORT."

TO THE EDITOR OF "THE MUSICAL TIMES."

SIR,—Your correspondent, Dr. G. Warriner, is desirous of knowing whether his assertion in re the above subject, referring to Meyerbeer and Spohr, is correct or not. For a number of years—1850 to 1861—I was a member of the late Sir M. Costa's orchestra, and also in the band of H.M. Coldstream Guards, and during that time I had many opportunities of seeing several of the composers Dr. Warriner mentions. He is decidedly wrong in his measurements of Meyerbeer, who was not more than five feet six inches (if he was even that), whereas Spohr was fully six feet (if not more). If my recollections of Mendelssohn and Rossini are correct, I should say that they were both about five feet eight inches.

TO CORRESPONDENTS.

. Notices of concerts, of which programmes must invariably be sent, and other information supplied by our friends in the country, must be forwarded as early as possible after the occurrence; otherwise they cannot be inserted.

Our correspondents will oblige by writing all names as clearly as possible, as we cannot be responsible for any mistakes that may occur.

Correspondents are informed that their names and addresses must accompany all communications.

We cannot undertake to return offered contributions; the authors, therefore, will do well to retain copies.

Notice is sent to all subscribers whose payment (in advance) is exhausted. The paper will be discontinued where the Subscription is not renewed. We again remind those who are disappointed in obtaining back numbers that, although the music is always kept in stock, only a sufficient quantity of the rest of the paper is printed to supply the current sale.

BRIEF SUMMARY OF COUNTRY NEWS.

We do not hold ourselves responsible for any opinions expressed in this summary, as all the notices are either collated from the local papers or supplied to us by correspondents.

AYLESBURY.—The Vale of Aylesbury Sacred Harmonic Society gave an excellent performance of Graun's Passion Music on the 4th ult. The principals were Miss Agnes Walker, Mr. C. W. Fredericks, and Mr. Robert Grice, who sang the somewhat trying solos most commendably. Mr. R. S. C. Keymer conducted with his customary ability, and the Orchestral Society assisted in the accompaniments of the work.

BEDMINSTER.—The first annual Festival of the Bristol South Nonconformist Choirs' Association took place on March 25, in the Wesleyan Chapel, Victoria Road. About fourteen choirs were represented, the number of singers being nearly three hundred. The Festival was really a sacred service, the choral music chiefly consisting of hymns. Mr. E. Rider conducted, and Mr. Bruton presided at the organ.

BISHOP'S STORTFORD.—Mr. Phillip Sharpe read an excellent paper on the life and work of Haydn, on March 25, before the Students' Association at the Technical School, with a comprehensive series of instrumental illustrations. Much interest was shown in the exhibition of a valuable collection of MSS. and drawings kindly lent by Messrs. Novello.

BRIDGEND.—At the Town Hall, on the 16th ult., a successful performance of "Judas Maccabæus" was given by the Choral Society, under the conductorship of Mr. W. McGaul. Mr. F. Hulley provided the orchestra, and the soloists engaged were Miss Armriding, Madame A. Parry, Mr. T. Barlow, and Mr. Fred. Owen.

BRIDLINGTON.—The Committee of the Musical Society has issued an attractive prospectus for the Musical Festival, to take place on the 16th inst. The chief works to be performed are Professor Villiers Stanford's choral ballad "The Revenge" and Mendelssohn's "Elijah," and the principal soloists are Miss Agnes Nicholls, Miss Kirkby Lunn, Miss Ena Bedford, Mr. H. Winsloe Hall, and Mr. Albert Archdeacon.

BURY ST. EDMUNDS.—The Choral Association concluded its recent season, on March 28, with an excellent performance of the "Elijah." The principal soloists were Miss M. P. Allen, Miss N. Richardson, the Rev. A. W. Ivatt, and Mr. E. Iles. The band and chorus, numbering 150, were conducted by Mr. Owen A. Clark.

ENNISCORTHY.—A successful vocal Concert was given on the 16th ult., in the Athenæum, under the conductorship of Mr. A. Fitzgerald. Part-songs and choruses were sung by a choir of forty voices, and vocal solos were contributed by Mrs. Kelly and the Misses M. Kelly, M. Lacy, L. Courtney, and C. Donohoe, and Messrs. Hendrich, M. J. Whelan, A. McDermott, J. J. O'Brien, and J. Doyle. Miss T. Ronayne also played a violoncello solo.

EPPING.—The Choral Society gave an excellent rendering of Handel's "Messiah" in the Town Hall recently, the orchestra and chorus numbering 120. The soloists were Madame Ada Patterson, Miss Minnie Chamberlain, Mr. Iver McKay, and Mr. Robert Grice. Mr. Horace Norton assisted at the pianoforte, Mr. Allan Clark at the organ, and Mr. Donald Penrose conducted.

EVESHAM.—The Choral Society, which for some years has been under the management of Miss Myra Taylor and Miss Gill Smith, gave its sixth annual Concert on the 17th ult., in the Town Hall. The first part of the programme consisted of Spohr's Oratorio "The Last Judgment," and the second was of a miscellaneous character. The principal vocalists were Miss Gill Smith, Miss A. Carter, Mr. C. Morgan, and Mr. F. Marston. Mrs. Leslie Sherwood and Mr. Ewart West were the accompanists, and Miss Myra Taylor conducted.

FELIXSTOWE.—The Choral Society, under the able direction of Mr. T. Palmer, concluded its recent season by an excellent performance of Handel's "Judas Maccabæus." The choir, of about eighty-four voices, was well sustained by the organ, played by Miss Fox, and an efficient orchestra; and the solos were effectively sung by Miss Florence Monk, Miss Kathleen Walton, Mr. H. J. Samford, and Mr. Arthur Walenn.

HARROGATE.—The members of the newly-formed Musical Society (of which the Mayor is president) gave their second performance of the season, on the 5th ult., in the "Spa" Concert-rooms. The work presented was Handel's "Samson," which was effectively rendered by a band of forty and a chorus of 140 performers. The principal vocalists were Messdames Goodall and Bellos, and Messrs. T. Child and W. Thornton, whose rendering of the various solos gave great satisfaction. Mr. G. W. Buckley was the leader of the orchestra, Mr. A. Tomlinson played the trumpet obbligato in "Let the bright Seraphim," and Mr. W. H. Breare conducted.

HENLEY-ON-THAMES.—On the 10th ult. Stainer's "Crucifixion" was given in Holy Trinity Church, by a choir of forty voices. The solos were sung by Mr. Wilfred Pepper (solo tenor, St. Paul's, Knightsbridge) and Mr. Franklin Davey (solo bass, St. Gabriel's, Piccadilly). Mr. J. Herbert Chalmers, organist and choirmaster, presided at the organ.

INVERCARGILL, NEW ZEALAND.—The report of the fifth annual meeting of the Choral Union, which took place on February 1, showed the Society to be in a most satisfactory condition. Many new members have been acquired and the library has been considerably increased. A hearty vote of thanks was passed to Mr. C. Grey for his successful efforts as Conductor, and the works selected for performance in the present season include "Judas Maccabæus," Macfarren's "May Day," and excerpts from "The Messiah," the "Elijah," and the "Creation."

KILDARE.—The annual Soirée of the Choral Society took place on the 6th ult., in the Victoria Hall. Part-songs were effectively sung, under the direction of Mr. Walter Bainton, and vocal solos were contributed by Miss B. Bartlett, Miss L. Dunn, Mr. P. Cowan, Mr. E. Daly, Mr. C. Riglen, and Mr. de Camp. During the evening presentations were made to Miss Florence Merchant, the accompanist of the Society, and to Mr. T. Bellis, who recently resigned the post of Conductor.

LEYTON.—Great credit is due to Mr. J. A. Lash for an excellent Concert conducted by him on the 3rd ult., in the Schoolroom of All Saints' Church. The programme was arranged in a somewhat novel manner, being divided into three parts, respectively entitled "The Holy Child," "The Crucified," and "The King of Kings," each part consisting of appropriate excerpts from the great masters. The soloists were Miss W. Ludlam, Mr. F. G. Kallmer, Mr. S. Brown, and Mr. H. Prenton; and the choruses were rendered by about forty voices. Miss C. Price and Mr. W. Wilson fulfilled the duties of accompanists.

NORTHAM.—The performance of Mendelssohn's "St. Paul" by the Choral Society, on the 3rd ult., attracted a large audience. Efficient soloists were provided in Miss A. Williams, Mrs. Baker, Mr. Sydney Harper, and Mr. W. Thomas, and the chorus sang with intelligence and precision. Mr. K. Parkhouse led the orchestra, and Mr. J. B. Bernard conducted.

NOVA SCOTIA.—Two performances of Stainer's "Crucifixion" were given during Lent in Halifax Cathedral, by the choir, under the direction of Mr. F. Gatward. The fine organ formerly owned by the Bournemouth Corporation has been purchased for the Cathedral. It has been enlarged by the builders, Messrs. Norman Bros., and is expected to reach its new destination early in this month.

NUNEATON.—The old Musical Society here ceased to exist about eleven years ago. Recently, however, a new Society has been formed under very encouraging circumstances, with a membership of over seventy, and Mendelssohn's "Hymn of Praise" is the work in rehearsal. The Rev. Dr. Deed, Vicar of Nuneaton, is the President, and Mr. John Ding, Organist of the Parish Church, the Conductor.

OPORTO.—The Choral Union, conducted by Mr. D. Macmillan, gave, on March 18, a successful performance of Dr. A. R. Gaul's sacred cantata "Ruth," the solos being sung by Miss Katzenstein, Miss J. Atkinson, Miss von Hafe, and Mr. J. M. Robertson. The second part of the programme included the choral pieces "The Bells of St. Michael's Tower," by Sir R. P. Stewart; Mendelssohn's "Early Spring"; "The Watchword," by Pinski; and a selection from Cowen's cantata "The Rose Maiden." In addition to the above-named vocalists, assistance was given by Mrs. W. Katzenstein, Miss K. Roope, and Messrs. F. Castro, C. F. Glennie, J. G. Milne, and J. M. Robertson. Miss von Hafe, Mr. D. Macmillan, and Mr. H. Guichard played the Adagio from Mayse's Third Piano-forte Trio (Op. 58); and Mrs. Skeffington, Mrs. W. M. Smith, and Miss E. Brambilla fulfilled the duties of accompanists.

READING.—Mr. J. C. B. Tirbutt, Professor of Music at the Reading University Extension College, gave his fourth Lecture, in the Small Town Hall, on the 1st ult., when he took for his subject "Mendelssohn and the 'Elijah.'" The hall was well filled by an attentive audience, and excerpts from the Oratorio were effectively sung by Miss B. Powell, Miss E. M. Gillett, and Mr. A. W. Knill. Mr. J. W. Martin occupied the chair.—The pupils of the Institute and School of Music, assisted by the band and chorus of the Choral Society, gave a successful miscellaneous Concert, on the 2nd ult., in the Old Town Hall. Miss Le Verrier, Mr. C. G. Thomas, and Mr. C. H. Thackway were the accompanists.

REIGATE.—Stainer's "Crucifixion" attracted a large congregation to St. Luke's Church, South Park, on the 3rd ult. The soloists were the Rev. A. H. Murray, Mr. S. Kelly, and Mr. H. W. Verrells. Great credit is due for the excellence of the performance to Mr. E. Osmond, who presided at the organ.

RYDE.—Impressive performances of Bach's "St. Matthew" Passion Music were given on the 2nd and 3rd ult., in All Saints' Church, under the direction of Mr. J. Godfrey Luard, to whom great praise is due for his enterprising energy and musicianlike skill. The choir was augmented for the occasion and the organ supported by instrumentalists. The solos were sung by Messrs. Sterndale Bennett, B. Love, W. Davies, and W. Kempton. Mr. A. C. Clarke played the violin obbligatos and Mr. Luard Selby presided at the organ. This performance should now be given annually in Holy Week.

STONEHOUSE.—The Amateur Orchestra, conducted by Dr. Walters, gave its annual Concert on the 9th ult., in the Subscription Rooms. The programme presented an attractive selection of light music, and features of the performance were the rendering of the Shepherds' Dance from Mr. German's incidental music to "Henry VIII." and the violin and oboe solos respectively played by Miss Nettie Atkinson and Mr. Lewin.

SUNNINGDALE.—The Philharmonic Society gave a most creditable performance of Handel's "Samson," on March 28, under the direction of Mr. E. Stephenson. The principal solos were sung by Miss M. Perrott, Miss D. Tickell, Mr. William Green, and Mr. H. Scott. The chorus sang with precision and intelligence, and a capable orchestra was led by Miss Ellison.

TENBY.—The Choral Society, under the direction of Mrs. Catby, gave a successful Concert on the 18th ult., when Barnett's "Ancient Mariner" was performed in the Assembly Rooms. The solos were entrusted to Miss Drinkwater, Miss A. Evans, Mr. Fred Whishaw, and Dr. Knowling.

THORNLIBANK.—At a Concert on the 5th ult., in the Public Hall, by the Philharmonic Society, an effective performance was given of Mr. Louis N. Parker's dramatic idyll "Silvia," the principal characters in which were personated by Miss A. M. Thomas, Miss N. Moir, Mr. G. Neil, and Mr. H. G. Gillespie. The accompaniments were played by Miss A. Stark and Mr. R. Turnbull, and Mr. J. B. Thomson conducted.

TUNBRIDGE WELLS.—The services at St. Augustine's Church were, on Palm Sunday, of their usual impressive character, the music including Gounod's "Messe Solennelle" and Rossini's "Stabat Mater." The principals in the latter work were Madame L. Barrett, Miss F. Croft, Mr. D. Clayton, and Mr. C. Formes. The choir was largely increased, and the organ, ably played by Miss Elliott, was supplemented by a stringed orchestra led by Mr. Harrington.

ORGAN APPOINTMENTS.—Mr. Oswald Staley Spark, Organist to the Parish Church of St. Laurence, Wichenford.—Mr. Selfe Fowles, Organist and Choirmaster of All Saints, North Pekham.

CHOIR APPOINTMENTS.—Mr. T. Westlake-Morgan, Choirmaster to St. Paul's Church, Colwyn Bay.—Mr. F. W. Norcup, Lay-Clerk (Tenor), to Bangor Cathedral.—Mr. W. Peskett (Tenor), to St. John the Baptist Church, Kensington.—Mr. James Keell (Tenor), to the Parish Church, Woolwich (Choirmaster).

FOR

SOLI, CHORUS, AND ORCHESTRA

BY

G. HENSCHEL.

VOCAL SCORE, 8VO, 2S. 6D.; VOCAL PARTS, 1S. EACH.

FULL SCORE, £2 2S.; ORCHESTRAL PARTS ON HIRE.

THE TIMES.

A musicianly piece of work and altogether worthy of Mr. Henschel's high reputation.

DAILY TELEGRAPH.

The new "Stabat Mater" is quite worthy of a place among accepted settings of the same text, and a valuable addition to the rich store of music possessed by the Roman Catholic Church. . . . There was not a dull moment or a break in close attention, the music becoming more full of interest as it proceeded, and the climax being the close. . . . When the spring of melody began to flow, as in the "Vidit suum dulcem natum" of the "Pro peccatis," in the "Eia Mater," in the beautiful "Fac me vere," and in the most tender and plaintive "Virgo, virginum præclara," no doubt of success could be entertained.

STANDARD.

Mr. Henschel's "Stabat Mater" is beyond all question an extremely thoughtful and musical work, and the composer, who conducted, must have been well satisfied with its performance, and with the hearty reception accorded to it by the audience.

MORNING POST.

Mr. Henschel may be congratulated upon the manner in which he has realised the meaning of the words, and succeeded in producing a work which, in spite of obvious comparisons, may be accepted as an admirable musical interpretation of the beautiful hymn. . . . The Italian-like beauty of the melody and treatment of the "Eia Mater" aroused genuine enthusiasm, which was increased by the subsequent number, the duo and chorus, "Fac me vere." Other impressive portions of the music met with cordial and appreciative recognition.

DAILY CHRONICLE.

Mr. Henschel has regarded the old Latin hymn from the most reverential aspect, so that it is a composition even better suited to a church congregation than to an ordinary concert audience, which cannot be affirmed of all versions, of Rossini, for example; but there is at least one section in which the pervading sombreness of tone is for a time suspended. This is the "Eia Mater," the fourth number, set as an alto solo and chorus. By lovers of flowing tune—and there are more such than some composers suppose—this number will be considered the gem of the work.

DAILY GRAPHIC.

It is a work of considerable originality, essentially romantic in its sentiment, and thoroughly in keeping with the ritual of the Church in the hymnology of which Giacomone's famous poem occupies so conspicuous a place.

LETTERS OF A BARITONE

By FRANCIS WALKER.

Small crown 8vo, 5s.

"He writes more than fairly well, and these familiar epistles, addressed by him from Florence to his sister in the States, have the merit not only of genuineness, but of brightness and thoughtfulness. Mr. Walker went to Italy to study the art of singing, and in these pages he describes the progress he achieved and records the impressions he received. . . . They are agreeably gossipy, and contain many interesting references to well-known musicians, both creative and executive. To students of singing they may be specially recommended."—Globe.

PRICE, EACH VOLUME, IN PAPER COVER, 4S.; OR, BOUND IN CLOTH, 6S.

PREFACE.

THE collective title given to these songs does not quite express the idea which the Composer had in view in writing them. But it was impossible to find an exact equivalent in English to the French Chansons Intimes or to the German Intime Liedchen.

In these short songs the Composer has tried to give expression to some of our deeper feelings or questionings—such songs as one might sing to oneself, when in the mood, or to some intimate friends.

The Composer is indebted to H.R.H. The Princess Louise (Marchioness of Lorne) for the drawings representing respectively Shadow and Sunshine, graciously designed for these two Volumes by Her Royal Highness.

THE DAISY CHAIN

WORDS AND MUSIC BY

HAMILTON CLARKE.

SUMMARY OF ARGUMENT.—The annual ceremony on the First of May, of the Installation of the Queen of the Daisy Chain, has been instituted by the Schoolmaster of the village, for the purpose of rewarding the most popular of the scholars in the girls' school. The celebration affords opportunity for an interesting display, and the author has woven into it a very ingenious and amusing plot, in which some of the most interesting characters are the Schoolmaster and Schoolmistress, a Ladies' Volunteer Ambulance Corps, commanded by Surgeon-Captain Amanda Chuckles, four other female and five male principal characters, with a chorus of schoolboys and girls. The scene is laid in the playground of the school.

PREFACE.

This "Elementary Primer for the Pianoforte" aims at supplying "beginners" with a "Method" to be used from end to end in the order in which it is compiled.

Although "Pianoforte Instructors" are as numerous as the sands of the sea, I claim for this one that it is quite original not only in its progressive order, but also in the language employed.

Convinced that it is worse than useless to crowd a child's mind with words which, to that child, convey no meaning, I have studiously used only such words as a child with moderate intelligence can be expected to understand.

The student must, before attempting to play, acquire a correct and unerring mental picture of the arrangement of the key-board.

Counting aloud should become a habit from the very first finger-exercises.

The customary "Household melodies" have been carefully avoided, because I confidently believe that, while engaged on a familiar melody, the student is unconsciously playing more or less "by ear," even correcting his own errors that way—instead of "reading" (deciphering every note of the Piece).

Diatonic Scales are not included. Till the student is sufficiently advanced to be taught the construction of major and minor scales, he is better without "scales" at all; and it does not come within the scope of an "Elementary Primer" to teach all that "the Scales" imply.

Some Scale-passages, however, with no necessary tonality, are included.

The so-called "English" fingering has been discarded in favour of the more universal "foreign" fingering.

THE CATHEDRAL PRAYER BOOK

BEING THE

BOOK OF COMMON PRAYER

WITH THE MUSIC NECESSARY FOR THE USE OF CHOIRS

TOGETHER WITH THE

CANTICLES AND PSALTER

POINTED FOR CHANTING

EDITED BY

SIR JOHN STAINER, M.A., Mus. Doc., OXON.

(Professor of Music in the University of Oxford)

AND

THE REV. WILLIAM RUSSELL, M.A., Mus. Bac., OXON.

(Succentor of St. Paul's Cathedral).

OPINIONS OF THE PRESS.

DAILY TELEGRAPH.

Messrs. Novello, Ewer and Co. have conferred a great boon upon the choirs and congregations of churches in which the services are choral, by publishing "The Cathedral Prayer Book." . . . One book instead of many—that is a good recommendation for the new issue, and we must compliment the editors and publishers on the manner in which they have discharged their task. With regard to the music, the Responses, Litany, and so forth, are given as sung in St. Paul's, and the contents generally in this department have been gathered from authoritative sources, and most carefully edited. The music and letterpress leave nothing to desire, while the get-up of the book is worthy of the Novello Press. We cannot conceive a more efficient aid to the Choral Service of the Church of England.

THE GUARDIAN.

The first of the two publications now before us is, on the whole, the best attempt which we have yet seen to provide on the lines of "Anglican" music a complete setting to the whole of the Prayer Book. . . . It is practically the use of St. Paul's Cathedral published in a simplified and yet complete form, and edited by the two musicians to whom the high position of the choir of St. Paul's amongst those of other cathedrals is chiefly due. The pointing of the Psalms which has been used is that of the "Cathedral Psalter," a preliminary instalment of the present work which has already appeared. Immediately after the general preface a short explanation of this pointing is given which is a model of clearness, and well worthy of study, not only as an explanation of this particular Psalter, but as a concise and practical exposition of the structure and form of the Anglican chant.

CHURCH TIMES.

"The Cathedral Prayer Book" is complete in all its parts, and neither priest nor singer need have any other copy of the Prayer Book in choir, a great advantage where choir stalls are of restricted dimensions. . . . The book as a whole is excellently printed, and prepared for the press with singular care. . . . We commend this book to the respectful attention of clergy, organists, choirmasters, and all other lovers of choral worship with the certain conviction that, whether they approve or not of various details, it cannot fail to be of material value in helping them to perform the Divine offices and to celebrate the highest Act of our worship with the solemnity which befits our approach to the Holiest.

SCOTSMAN.

The musical editing is most thoroughly done, and—what is no small matter in a book of this kind—the printing both of words and music is admirably clear and legible. The work will be welcome to choirs and choirmasters throughout the English Church.

SATURDAY REVIEW.

Clergymen and all the denizens of "quires and places where they sing" ought to be very much obliged to Sir John Stainer and Mr. Russell for bringing out this book. It does for the intoned service what "Hymns Ancient and Modern" has done for the service of song. . . . In the volume before us an attempt is made—and it seems to us a very successful attempt—to remedy the state of things thus described in the Preface: "The Music of the Versicles and Responses—Festal as well as Ferial—and a Psalter and Canticles pointed for chanting are almost indispensable for the careful and accurate rendering of a Choral Service. And yet, hitherto, it has been scarcely possible to procure these, unless in separate numbers, involving not only much additional expense, but also the disadvantage arising from the continual shifting of books during Service time, which is such a hindrance to a devout participation in Divine Worship." Any clergyman will agree in these expressions of the editors, and will look on the new volume as a boon.

JOHN BULL.

Of the convenience of a manual which provides in a compact form, and so far as is possible, all that is requisite for the choral rendering of the Church's Services, little need be said. The compilers of "The Cathedral Prayer Book" have aimed at doing for the Book of Common Prayer what was done for the Service Books of old by proper ecclesiastical authority. . . . "The Cathedral Prayer Book," compiled by the former Organist and the present Succentor of St. Paul's Cathedral, at least enjoys the prestige arising from the fact that it embodies the existing musical use of that great church—a church celebrated all over Europe for the excellence of its music. . . . On the assumption that Anglican music is that which ought to be adopted, "The Cathedral Prayer Book" is probably as near perfection as anything we are likely to see.

IRISH TIMES.

One of the principal objects of the present volume is to prevent the inconvenience arising from the constant shifting of books during the service, as well as the expense of supplying several books to each member. As, however, we have remarked before, there is even a stronger reason for recommending the work to Churches—namely, that it will encourage the general congregation to an intellectual participation in the choral portions of the service, and thus prevent that drowsy indifference which is at present too often manifested in many cases. The book is small and portable, about the same size as the present Church Hymnal, and is sold at a price marvellously small, considering its character. . . . The work has evidently received all that care and thought in its compilation which it is in the power of two such well-known and distinguished musicians as the Professor of Music of Oxford University and the Succentor of St. Paul's Cathedral to bestow, and we would recommend it very strongly to the notice of our clergy, choirmasters, and organists.

PROGRESSIVE STUDIES

FOR THE PIANOFORTE

EDITED, ARRANGED IN GROUPS, AND THE FINGERING REVISED AND SUPPLEMENTED

BY

FRANKLIN TAYLOR.

THIS Collection of Studies is intended to illustrate the various elements of a complete course of pianoforte technique, and to provide students with the means of attacking and overcoming the different special difficulties which have to be encountered. With this view, the Studies have been arranged in groups, those in each group being placed in progressive order, and having reference to some one particular difficulty. The greater part of the Studies themselves have been selected from the standard works of the most eminent Study-writers, and with these are included numerous others, which, though of equally great practical utility, have hitherto been less generally accessible.

FIFTY-TWO BOOKS, PRICE ONE SHILLING EACH.

"Mr. Franklin Taylor's splendid series of 'Progressive Studies' has advanced considerably since the earlier books were reviewed in The Times; those lately issued contain a book of Staccato Studies, two books of 'Repetition and Tremolo,' two of 'Part-playing,' and two of 'Rhythm.' The examples are chosen from numerous sources that are not, for the most part, in the ordinary repertory of the schools; and it is almost pathetic to think of the acres of Czerny's works, for example, that the able editor must have traversed in order to find good studies for the different branches of his book. His own examples are one and all excellent in design, and many of them are agreeable compositions, though all keep their practical end well in view. The choice of examples for 'Part-playing' was so wide that this of itself must have been a difficulty; the arrangements from Rink's Organ School are very suitable, and this division of the book ends with a Fugue by Mozart. No doubt the reason for not including any examples by Bach in this class was that the immortal '48' are in themselves the highest school of part-playing, and that any mere selection from them would be very little use. The books on 'Rhythm' contain many different kinds of difficulties, and here and there are studies that look quite easy at first, only revealing after a time some passage calculated to entrap the unwary student. The collection is entirely worthy of praise, and when the set of fifty-two books is completed it should be recognised as the standard work on technique."—The Times.

21, Campden Hill Road, Kensington, W."A most interesting and attractive concert was given yesterday afternoon in Princes' Hall by Mrs. Lee, a singer of exceptional accomplishment, who possesses not merely a voice of remarkable volume and purity, but a rare power of artistic interpretation. Her singing of Schubert's 'Lindenbaum' and 'Aufenthalt' was wholly delightful. . . . Two of Brahms's songs in dialect from his Op. 7 and his beautiful 'Geistliches Wiegenlied' were sung to perfection."—The Times, February 16, 1895."Mrs. Lee's vocal recital at Princes' Hall, on the 15th ult., was of more than ordinary interest. To the charm of a contralto voice of admirable quality Mrs. Lee added singular gifts of expression. . . . Her success was genuine and deserved."—Musical Times, March, 1895."In Mrs. Lee . . . the ranks of our concert singers have gained a valuable recruit. Her choice of music was admirable and her interpretation marked by the welcome qualities of sympathy, enthusiasm, and intelligence. Her enunciation is excellent. . . . and she has the gift of communicating to her hearers not a little of the enjoyment that she takes in her singing."—Guardian, February 20, 1895.

JOHN RIDDING, R.C.M.

(BARITONE).

SWANSEA CHORAL SOCIETY CONCERT, APRIL 25, 1895.

SIR JULIUS BENEDICT'S "ST. PETER."

CAMBRIAN, APRIL 26, 1895.

Mr. John Ridding, R.C.M., interpreted the part of St. Peter, and more than enhanced the reputation he won in the "Elijah." His rich sonorous voice, which he managed with much ease and grace, was at its best. Those who had previously heard Mr. Ridding will know what that really means. "How great, O Lord," and "Know not I" were grandly rendered, and met with well-deserved and enthusiastic plaudits.

SOUTH WALES DAILY POST, APRIL 26, 1895.

Of the soloists, Mr. John Ridding is entitled to first place. The part of St. Peter is one which gives him every opportunity of showing off the beauties of his vocalism, and his dramatic and dignified rendering of the part, combined with his fine voice and clear enunciation emphasised the favour with which he has come to be regarded by Swansea audiences.

DAILY LEADER, APRIL 26, 1895.

Much of the honour of the evening fell to Mr. John Ridding. There is no need to speak to Swansea people of Mr. Ridding's merits, and when one says that he was in great form it will be evident that he must have scored a great success.

MISS OSBORNE RAYNER,

Principal Contralto of the Choral Societies at Albert Hall, Queen's Hall, &c., in London and Provinces.

MR. WILLIAM DEVER,

Principal Baritone of all Choral and Ballad Concerts in London and Provinces.

MR. JOHN CHILD,

For five years Principal Tenor, Carl Rosa Grand Opera Company.

MR. CHARLES MANNERS,

Primo Basso, Royal Italian Opera, Covent Garden.

SOLO INSTRUMENTALISTS—

MISS GORDON NUNN,

Solo Violin at the Principal Orchestral Concerts in London and the Provinces.

MR. NOEL JOHNSTONE,

Solo Violoncello at the Crystal Palace, Queen's Hall, St. James's Hall, &c., Concerts.

MR. ALFRED BLOME,

Solo Violin at most of the Principal Concerts in London.

MR. JOHN ANSELL,

Solo Viola, Covent Garden, Crystal Palace, &c.

A DOUBLE-BASS FOR SOLOS, QUARTETS, &c., will be included with the above Artists.

CONDUCTOR AND PIANIST: MR. LAWRENCE HANRAY.

Mr. Hanray has conducted at Drury Lane and Principal London Oratorio Societies.

Suggested Programme for a FULL Ballad Concert.

Parts I. and II. could consist of VOCAL AND STRING QUARTETS, TRIOS, OR INSTRUMENTAL SOLOS, &c., AND BALLAD SCENAS, &c. accompanied with one or more STRINGS, OBBLIGATOS, &c., SONGS, &c., the whole lasting from two to three hours.

Suggested Programme for Ballad and Opera (IN COSTUME) Concert

(which we found so great a novelty and success last season).

Part I. could consist of BALLADS, SCENAS, DUETS, STRING QUARTETS, TRIOS, VIOLIN SOLOS, &c., same as above, only lasting for about an hour and a quarter.

Part II. OPERA OR OPERETTA (in costume) ACCOMPANIED BY THE SIX INSTRUMENTAL ARTISTS, WHICH WOULD FORM AN ORCHESTRA

Suggested Programme for Choral Society.

Part I. A small Oratorio Work with Chorus.

Part II. An Operetta in Costume, or the above party can be engaged for a whole work (Oratorio or Opera), or Opera in Costume or Recital.

IMPORTANT NOTICE.—By special arrangement the above Solo Instrumentalists would play in a work given by a Choral Society, or a Society can engage one or all the Instrumentalists, as well as one or all the Singers, for an Oratorio, or Recital of an Opera, thereby saving the travelling expenses of Instrumentalists coming from a distance.

RÉPERTOIRE.

"Faust" (Gounod), "Philemon and Baucis" (Gounod) (by arrangement with Sir Augustus Harris)."Maritana" (Wallace), "Bohemian Girl" (Balfe), &c., and most of the usual Oratorios, &c.

The Garden Scene from "Faust" or "Philemon and Baucis" or "Maritana" or "Bohemian Girl" (without Chorus, but in Costume), is good for Second Part of a Ballad Concert.

N.B.—The Opera that is selected by the judges from the Operas sent in for our £100 (and 5 per cent. on the net receipts) Prize Competition will be performed at Drury Lane Theatre the end of May, and will then be added to the above Répertoire.

Everything, such as Costumes, &c., will be provided by the party except Piano. No Scenery is required.

ANY OF THE ABOVE ARTISTS CAN BE ENGAGED SEPARATELY, AND MADAME FANNY MOODY OR MR. CHARLES MANNERS CAN ACCEPT THEIR USUAL ENGAGEMENTS.

For Terms, &c., please write to permanent address—

ANTHEM

COMPOSED BY

HENRY PURCELL

EDITED BY H. ELLIS WOOLDRIDGE.

Price Fourpence.

NOTE.—This Anthem, for five voices, and scored in the original for strings and organ, is taken from the magnificent autograph volume of Purcell's compositions in the library of H.M. the Queen at Buckingham Palace. No other copy is known to exist, and it has never before been printed.

A transcription was made, by Her Majesty's gracious permission, for the Editor's forthcoming edition of Purcell's anthems and services to be published by the Purcell Society, and the present arrangement is intended primarily for the convenience of singers and the public at the Bi-centenary Festival to be held with the assistance of the Society, on November 21, in Westminster Abbey, when the anthem will be performed. The necessary tempi and marks of expression have been kindly suggested by Dr. J. F. Bridge.

SINCERITY IN MUSIC.

I CANNOT do better than put at the head of these remarks Archbishop Tillotson's definition of sincerity:—

"Sincerity is to speak as we think, to do as we pretend and profess, to perform and make good what we promise, and really to be what we would seem and appear to be. . . . Sincerity is the most compendious wisdom and an excellent instrument for the speedy despatch of business. It is like travelling in a plain beaten road, which commonly brings a man to his journey's end sooner than by-ways, in which men often lose themselves."

Upon this text it would be easy to preach a sermon applicable to us all in the general and ordinary relations of life, but that is not the work presently in hand. I wish rather to consider the function of sincerity in relation to music, and to the duties of those who, in various capacities, are ministers of the art. It may be objected that the moral quality in question has no very obvious relationship to music. To say that, however, is to speak in the haste which once led King David astray, and I must again contend that you cannot dissociate moral qualities from the exercise of human powers, no matter what the field of labour. Whether we be composers of music, or hedgers and ditchers, we are all under the obligation to act, for example, with sincerity, or, as Tillotson puts it, "really to be what we would seem and appear to be." "Very good," you say, "but tell us what are the marks of an insincere musician, that we may recognise him and not be deceived, or led into a false estimate of his value." That is a fair demand, and bespeaking the reader's patience and indulgence, I will try to satisfy it.

An insincere musician is one who primarily regards his art as a means of making money. Nay, do not laugh, though I am willing to pardon the merriment in consideration of the spirit of our age and country, and of its readily accepted teaching that the luxury and power which come with gold are man's highest good. It is like crying in the wilderness to assert the contrary. One's words are lost in the vastness of unresponsive space. Nevertheless, it becomes needful to bear such witness, not, however, without discrimination in applying the argument. It would be absurd to condemn all round an absorbing pursuit of gain. With accruing wealth, for instance, the man of business increases the scope of his operations, and sincerity in such a case involves the making of profit a first consideration after honesty. But the musician is in another category altogether. With him, wealth—that is to say, means in excess of reasonable needs—is unnecessary to the utmost duty and labour that can be required of him, and we must consider, also, the ever-present danger that it will beget indifference to higher things, for, as Burton says: "Worldly wealth is the devil's bait." Without being drawn into a homily on the vanity of riches, let me add that the man who follows an art less for itself than for gold incurs the gravest possible risk. He is generally in a bad way. He courts, instead of avoiding temptations to insincerity, and often misses the prize of his high calling. The Interpreter had Christiana and her company into a room "where was a man that could look no way but downwards, with a muck-rake in his hand. There stood also one over his head with a celestial crown in his hand, and proffered him that crown for his muck-rake; but the man did neither look up nor regard, but raked to himself the straws, the small sticks, and dust of the floor."

It may be asked why a higher life, involving larger sacrifices, is demanded of the artist than, say, of the business man. Nobody would put this question in relation to the religious teacher, yet the difference between the vocation of an artist and that of a man consecrated to spiritual things is one of degree only, not of essence. Both have to do with the ideal—with the first principles of Beauty and Truth; the work of both is sacred, in that each has to interpret to his fellows the Divine teaching, either of the written Word or as it shines on the larger page of creation; and each resembles the other in this point also—namely, that any falling short of pure and simple devotion to duty inevitably involves a disqualification. Neither can be "worldly" without dishonour to a commission which entrusts to him the ministry of things above and beyond mere sordid interests. Not often, it is to be feared, do those who devote themselves to music as a profession think upon the obligations they assume. The art is more generally a chosen pathway to fame and fortune, or the gratification of vanity by applause and adulation, and, though such ends may be gained only by a fortunate few, none the less do they exercise a pernicious influence upon the many. By these remarks it is not intended to undervalue, much less despise, the material rewards which come to gifted sons of art. But to be honourable, they must not have been gained by violence done to high and pure ideals. Fortunate the man to whom they come in the straight path of duty; he is a traitor who turns aside to pick them up. The sincere musician will not so turn aside, but press forward to that truer prize—a consciousness of talents faithfully used and of a mission well discharged. This may involve poverty—Beethoven was poor—but not the poverty of which humanity need be ashamed.

An insincere musician is he who yields to any consideration short of that which seeks the highest good of his art. In the fifth chapter of his "Seven Lamps of Architecture," Ruskin points out that man is a "double creature":—

"Most part of his being seems to have a fictitious counterpart, which it is at his peril if he do not cast off and deny. Thus he has a true and false (otherwise called a living and dead, or a feigned or unfeigned) faith. He has a true and a false hope, a true and a false charity, and, finally, a true and a false life. . . . It (the false) is that life of custom and accident in which many of us pass our time in the world; that life in which we do what we have not purposed, and speak what we do not mean, and assent to what we do not understand; that life which is overlaid by the weight of things external to it, and is moulded by them instead of assimilating them; that which, instead of growing and blossoming under any wholesome dew, is crystallised over with it as with hoarfrost, and becomes to the true life what an arborescence is to a tree, a candied agglomeration of thoughts and habits foreign to it, brittle, obstinate, and icy, which can neither bend nor grow, but must be crushed and broken to bits, if it stand in our way. All men are liable to be frost-bitten in this sort; all are partly encumbered and crusted over with idle matter; only, if they have real life in them, they are always breaking this bark away in noble rents, until it becomes, like the black strips upon the birch-tree, only a witness of their own inward strength. But, with all the efforts that the best men make, much of their being passes in a kind of dream, in which they, indeed, move and play their parts sufficiently, to the eyes of their fellow dreamers, but have no real consciousness of what is around them, or within them; blind to the one, insensible to the other."

These wise and warning words are worthy of consideration by all, not least by the musician, who is peculiarly sensitive to the influences making for the false life—for that second and artificial nature which comes of use and custom. He is, moreover, specially in danger through the universal popularity of his art; the prevailing poverty of taste among those who support it, and the obligation under which he lies of being in constant contact with things external to the true life. In such a position it is, indeed, difficult to resist a habit of doing what we have not purposed, speaking what we do not mean, and assenting to what we do not understand. Thus men catch the "tone of society," become conventional and, as Ruskin expresses it, frost-bitten. The effect of such a process is deadening, as far as the true life is concerned, and it seems a Providential arrangement that nearly all the greatest composers have lived in comparative seclusion and safety, or been endowed with that unabateable enthusiasm for the ideal which serves as armour of triple brass against lower influences. But let us enquire what it is in the promptings of the false life that sincere musicians should resist more particularly. In the first place, they should guard against the adoption of principles and methods simply because of their vogue. When a man takes counsel with his inner and real self as to these, and when, in the result, his judgment approves, there is no more to be said. He must adopt them at the peril of insincerity. But when adoption is merely obedience to fashion or custom, insincerity is actual and flagrant. Then the man becomes a time-server; a tradesman who will dress his shop window with any goods the passers-by may fancy. I shrink from enquiring how many such musicians now exist, but may point to the suspicious family likeness noticeable in the compositions of the present day and, for that matter, in those of any given period. "So many men, so many minds," is a proverb which does not entirely apply to composers, if we judge, that is to say, by visible evidence. Yet we know that each composer has a nature of his own, which, if allowed expression, would differentiate him from his fellows in one or more essential respects. The Creator does not use a mould twice. Nevertheless we find musicians conforming with marvellous plasticity. Some leader amongst them sets a pattern and the rest copy it with no more than the differences due to varying degrees of power. Hence we have had amongst us within living memory a Spohr pattern, a Mendelssohn pattern, and the Wagner pattern. Older kinds are, of course, always kept in stock. Let not my meaning be misapprehended here. A great composer cannot but influence his contemporaries and immediate successors. It is in the nature of things for him to set a fashion, but his followers and imitators may be divided into two sections—those whose carefully exercised judgment and taste approve him as a model, and those who copy him because his music happens to have impressed the public ear. The first class are sincere, if not original; in the second there is neither originality nor sincerity.

We are sometimes told that the music of the present day is chiefly imitative; that all its features can be traced to their source in the works of composers no longer with us. Admitting that the statement is mainly true, and that its truth endangers the reputation of contemporary writers for sincerity, there remains something to be said on the other side. A great authority has declared that "it is no sign of deadness in a present art that it borrows or imitates, but only if it borrows without paying interest," by which is meant failing to subordinate what is appropriated from others to the workings of the borrower's own vigorous individuality. If this be true, an imitative age may be, in a measure, an original and sincere age. To the question how imitation can be made healthy and vital, Ruskin makes a most interesting reply. He points out, first, that two very distinguishing characteristics of vital imitation are its Frankness and its Audacity, continuing thus:—

"Its Frankness is especially singular; there is never any effort to conceal the degree or the sources of its borrowing. Raffaello carries off a whole figure from Masaccio, or borrows an entire composition from Perugino, with as much tranquillity and simplicity of innocence as a young Spartan pickpocket; and the architect of a Romanesque basilica gathered his columns and capitals where he could find them, as an ant picks up sticks. There is at least a presumption, when we find this frank acceptance, that there is a sense within the mind of power capable of transforming and renewing whatever it adopts, and too conscious, too exalted to fear the charge of plagiarism—too certain that it can prove, and has proved, its independence to be afraid of expressing its homage to what it admires in the most open and indubitable way; and the necessary consequence of this sense of power is the other sign I have named—the audacity of treatment when it finds treatment necessary, the unhesitating and sweeping sacrifice of precedent where precedent becomes inconvenient."

Remarking, as I pass on, that the quotation just made might be used as a powerful vindication of Handel, the frankest and most audacious of musical borrowers, let us consider the implication of Ruskin's teaching, that an imitative age is not necessarily insincere. He gives us the test of sincerity in the use made of "conveyed" material. The borrower, to be justified, to be anything better than a perpetrator of petty larceny, must do with the things borrowed as the Lombard architects did with the remains of a higher art lying all about them. The Lombards took these fragments and used them as material for a new and independent development. "I do not know any sensation more exquisite than the discovering of the evidence of this magnificent struggle into independent existence; the detection of the borrowed thoughts, nay, the finding of the actual blocks and stones carved by other hands and in other ages, wrought into the new walls, with a new expression and purpose given to them, like the blocks of unsubdued rocks which we find in the heart of the lava current, great witnesses to the power which has fused all but those calcined fragments into the mass of its homogeneous fire."

It is thus that the appropriator may justify himself by becoming also an originator—a builder who so deals with old materials as that they put on a new expression, and illustrate alike the vitality and the variety of true art. For the mere copyist, the pallid reflex of ruddy men, the feeble echo of strident voices, there should be no mercy. Let him be treated as a dealer in debased coin.

Another form of insincerity in music is shown by the composer whose audacity—to carry on Ruskin's word—is not the legitimate product of his own vitality, but a calculated means towards the end of a conspicuous place in the eyes of the world. I do not wish to speak, with Max Nordau, of an all-pervading degeneracy. The thing is not an article in my creed, which asserts, rather, that the world's condition is more hopeful than ever it was, though each era, no doubt, brings its own special reasons for anxiety.

Among the evils of the present day one must see a craving for notoriety. Men—and women too, more's the pity—want to be talked about; to do something, it scarcely matters what, which shall make their name known and, mayhap, win a place for their portrait in illustrated papers. The most direct road to this glorious consummation runs by way of Audacity, and therein do many musicians walk, vying with each other which shall, by boldness and irreverence, draw the attention of the world. The ways of self-advertisement unknown to them are few; there are no heights of traitordom in art to which they are not prepared to climb, and from the bad eminence defy the "reign of Law." "Law!" say they, "there is no law. Law was made for slaves; we are free men. We proclaim Liberty. Let every man do what is right in his own eyes, and let him be greatest who achieves that of which License in the past never dreamed. Order and Beauty are common in the world, and cannot serve our purpose; let us work with the chaotic and the ugly. Some may then worship us as the prophets of a new dispensation, and many more follow us with wondering eyes." Is this the language of exaggeration? Perhaps, but I wish to emphasise the proportions and character of an evil which may, in the end, justify my words. There is no form of insincerity in music so dangerous as that which employs extravagance, asserts contempt of rule, and uses the name of freedom as a cover for licentiousness. By such means, no doubt, a man may become notorious. Wagner once said of Meyerbeer that, on a coach, he would seize the reins in order, by the zig-zag motion of the vehicle, to attract the attention of the passer-by. But what inglorious distinction is this! There are men in society who, rather than be inconspicuous, put on the manners of a boor, or go about with words that shock the decent, or parade a shameless cynicism which, in most cases, they do not feel. Their counterparts are not unknown in music, whose most authoritative canons, whose very raison d'être of beauty, we see violated every day of our lives.

The desire for fame is commendable and necessary; worthy of all honour is he who gratifies it by legitimate means. But the passion may be, and often is, a curse—certainly a curse when it tempts to insincerity and forms of extravagance designed simply to attract notice. "It is necessary," said the late Mr. Hamerton ("Thoughts about Art"), "to draw a trenchant distinction between this right desire for fame and the morbid or foolish longing for it on its own account. It is one thing to desire to be celebrated, that we may work with due effect, and another to desire only that we may be celebrated." He charitably adds: "But even the most diseased and degraded craving for notoriety is often the perversion of a true instinct unconscious of its own import."

The sum of the whole matter is that the musician should, first of all, be sincere, and leave the rest to the Power which "shapes our ends." The consideration is very vital. Insincerity in art means ruin to the higher nature from which alone come artistic impulses. It disorganises and degrades; it turns a sense of duty into one of mere policy; it transforms honest straightforwardness into trickery, and banishes truth to put a lie in its place. Were I now speaking to a body of young musicians I would say: Let nothing—no desire of material gain, no thirst for applause, no cheap and easy means of "getting on"—draw you away from the path of manful endeavour to work out the end of your artistic being frankly and honestly. Let conviction go before action; follow no guide a step farther than he appears to you worthy of imitation; adopt no fashion that your sober judgment disapproves; do nothing of which, in the Palace of Truth, you would be ashamed. Thus, though neither fame nor wealth may be won, you will always have with you the precious treasure of self-respect.

JOSEPH BENNETT.

A BEETHOVEN AUTOGRAPH.

EVERYTHING that has belonged to a great man possesses interest, down to the clothes which he wore or the furniture which he handled. In some, perhaps many, cases, no doubt, the curiosity is a vulgar one; but in others it proceeds from a proper feeling of admiration, nay, reverence. But of all relics, autographs, whether of books or of music, are the most precious. In the very handwriting of a great man lies something of his genius; on beholding it one seems to get closer to the man's feelings, closer to the meaning of his words or notes; penstrokes have in them life and individuality.

A fac-simile has just been printed of the whole of the autograph of Beethoven's Sonata in A flat (Op. 26), the first attempt, we believe, to give one of the master's compositions in complete form. Some little time ago Sir George Grove, in a letter to The Times, suggested that the autographs of Beethoven's Symphonies should be dealt with in similar manner. His scheme has, unfortunately, not yet been carried into execution; the appearance of this Sonata may, however, be the means of drawing fresh attention to it. The publishing of the autographs, whether of sonatas or symphonies, in fac-simile would satisfy the curiosity, and a very legitimate one too, of all musicians; but it would effect something of higher importance. A time, however remote, will come when it will be said of the autographs of Beethoven, as Carlyle said of "rough" Samuel Johnson and "sleek wheedling" James Boswell, that "they were and are not." Discussions arise from time to time as to the correctness of this or that note, this or that mark in Beethoven's music, and then reference to the autograph copy, when obtainable, becomes of essential importance. When time has destroyed the autographs, fac-similes will be invaluable.

Not only for the publication,* but for the discovery of the autograph of the Sonata in A flat (Op. 26), musicians are indebted to Dr. Erich Prieger, of Bonn. In the year 1878 he found the precious document among some old books on medicine and theology—a juxtaposition which, if only the theology were sound, would surely have met with the approval of Dr. Martin Luther—in a private house; and ever since then he entertained the idea which he has now carried into execution. Dr. Prieger's interest in all matters relating to Beethoven is great; and so, too, is his enthusiasm. We may, therefore, find this publication followed by others. Of the thirty-two Pianoforte Sonatas, some of the autographs are unfortunately lost; but among those preserved are some of the finest (Op. 53, 57, 90, 109, 110, 111). In an interesting preface Dr. Prieger refers to the principal sketches made by Beethoven while working at this A flat Sonata. The early one of the Funeral March is indeed characteristic of the master; it shows, as Dr. Prieger observes, a strange evolutionary process: something simple, almost commonplace, becomes something deep and mighty. Allusion is also made to three Sonatas (Op. 23, Nos. 1-3) composed by J. B. Cramer, and dedicated to Haydn, by which Beethoven is said to have been influenced while writing his work; and two passages are quoted from the first Cramer Sonata, likewise in A flat, which certainly may, as Dr. Prieger admits, have suggested the form of certain passages in the Finale of Beethoven's Sonata. More than this cannot be said.

And now let us turn to the Beethoven autograph, and by mentioning one or two points, show that the possession of this, or of other fac-similes, is not merely a matter of passing interest, but of lasting value. They may solve doubtful points, or, as in the publication before us, enable us in places even to trace the music in course of development. The treble of the tenth bar from the end of the theme of the Andante con Variazioni is printed, in all editions with which we are acquainted, as follows:—

But in the autograph, after the D natural, we find two notes added—

They are, of course, the notes which one would naturally play; but if indicated by Beethoven, they ought, most certainly, to have been printed. The proof sheets which the composer corrected for the press could alone decide the matter: it may be that at the last moment Beethoven ran his pen through the notes in question. The interest here is not in the notes themselves, which are unimportant, but in the fact that there is a difference between the autograph and the printed version. If this be an oversight, it seems just possible that in other works omissions of greater moment may have been made. In the printed version of the Finale there is a passage—which looks strange, and which sounds somewhat unsatisfactory. The reason for the omission of the single octave in the second bar is, however, clear. The movement is in quick time (Allegro), and were the octave played the left-hand thumb would come in the way of the right one. The passage in question occurs three times during the movement and each time, it is printed the same way. Now, on examining the autograph, one finds in all three passages unmistakable signs of an erasure of the lower c; in the third passage a portion of the stem can still be traced (the fac-simile, it should be stated, is wonderfully distinct). Beethoven, therefore, had originally written the octave note. By whose hand was it erased? By his own or by that of the publisher? The erasure by means of a knife is, to say the least, not Beethovenish. In other parts of the Sonata a wrong note or chord is carefully scratched through with pen, and the correct note or chord written in to the left or right of the original one, and even over or under it.

There are other interesting variations, of which we can briefly notice only one or two.

The first bar of the Trio of the Funeral March appears thus in the autograph—

Beethoven marks the sordino with the loud notes; also, senza sordino during the piano tremolo. So, too, in the last bars (the Coda) of the first movement, we find, after the pp, cresc. senza sordino.

And we would allude to the frequent printing of dots, where dashes are clearly indicated in the autograph. A notable passage occurs in the first variation—and the two following bars. The dashes here seem most appropriate. Beethoven has written dots in the Coda of the first movement, and again in the Scherzo, so that there is no possibility of mistaking the one for the other.

* As-dur Sonate (Op. 26). Von Ludwig van Beethoven. Fac-simile. Herausgegeben von Erich Prieger. Verlag von Friedrich Cohen, in Bonn, 1895.

had settled in the British metropolis as a professor of the double bass, and was sufficiently a musician to undertake the early education of his young daughter as a singer. In due time, he sent her to a Conservatory at Venice, placing her there under the well-known Sacchini. In 1780 the fair student was ready to appear on the lyric stage, and did so in Florence with brilliant success. From the banks of the Arno, Miss Storace went to Parma, Milan, and Vienna, winning high favour in each city. It was not

ANNA CELINA STORACE.

And so we could go on to speak of bars scratched out and re-written, of marks of expression, &c. Pianists probably know the work by heart, and it will, therefore, be best to leave them to study the autograph for themselves, and to note other differences and features of interest.

FROM MY STUDY.

ANNA CELINA STORACE, who for some time held a distinguished position among vocalists in this country, was a native of London, where she was born in 1761. Her father, an Italian, long, however, before the now popular prima donna turned her steps towards the place of her birth. She reached London in 1788, and at once stepped into the front rank of vocalists. In 1790 she took part in the famous Commemoration of Handel at Westminster Abbey, having previously engaged herself as a regular member of the Drury Lane company, with whom she remained till the death of her brother, Stephen Storace, in 1796. The favourite artist then went back to Italy, singing at Turin, Milan, and elsewhere till 1801, when she appeared at Covent Garden, there remaining till 1808. Her later years were spent in retirement at Dulwich, where she died, in 1817. Two great events in the life of this artist stand out in strange contrast as respectively fortunate and unfortunate. The one was her creation of the part of Susannah in Mozart's "Marriage of Figaro"; the other her unhappy union with John Abraham Fisher, the violinist. For some interesting details of Miss Storace's career see Kelly's "Recollections."

William Shield is almost forgotten now, being represented among musical activities only by a few songs; but he was a conspicuous man in his day, and filled a large place. The date of Shield's birth is given as 1754 by some authorities, by others as 1748; the place is said to be Swallowwell, Durham. His father, a singing-master, gave him early lessons in music; but dying when the boy was nine years old, left his son to the care of others, who apprenticed their charge to a boat-builder at North Shields. The term of service was faithfully worked out, but the lad's musical education did not stop. Avison gave him lessons in theory, and to such purpose was the violin studied that, at the end of his apprenticeship, the young boat-builder appeared as leader of the Newcastle Subscription Concerts. Shield now went on from success to success. He became leader at the Scarborough Theatre and Concerts, second violin in the Opera band (1772), principal viola player (1773), and composer to Covent Garden Theatre (1783); all this time showing himself a prolific and able creative musician. Shield died in Berners Street, January 25, 1829, and his remains rest in the South Cloister of Westminster Abbey. With regard to the merits of this composer's music, an intelligent writer in the Quarterly Musical Review says: "Late as he appeared, he struck out for himself a style of writing, pure, chaste, and original. His most prominent characteristic is, however, simplicity. No composer has ever woven so few notes into such sweet and impressive melodies, while the construction of the bass and harmony is natural, easy, and unaffected. . . . Perhaps no writer is so remarkable for songs containing so much that is strictly national. After Purcell, we consider Shield to be the finest and most perfect example of really English composers." He should be remembered at the present day by more than a few songs, such as "The Wolf" and "The Thorn," and a smaller number of concerted pieces like the "Loadstars," in which

Shield perpetrated the amazing blunder of making Shakespeare say:

Thine eyes are loadstars and thy tongue sweet air.
More tunable than lute to shepherd's ear, &c.

Samuel Arnold, a native of London, was born on August 10, 1740, and educated at the Chapel Royal, St. James's, under Gates and Nares. Such were his natural abilities and industry that, at the age of twenty-three, Beard appointed him composer to Covent Garden Theatre, in which capacity he produced, in 1765, his celebrated opera "The Maid of the Mill." One of his biographers remarks concerning this work: "Many of the songs were selected from the works of Bach, Galuppi, Jomelli, and other Italian writers. This opera was one of the first, since the time of Purcell, in which concerted music was employed to carry on the business of the stage, and it was used by Arnold with great cleverness." Encouraged by his initial success, Arnold wrote no fewer than forty-three operas, after-pieces, &c., between 1765 and 1802. Meanwhile he did not neglect other branches of the art. In 1767 he produced an Oratorio called "The Cure of Saul," words by Dr. Brown, and again made a good start. Other works of the same character followed—"Abimelech," the "Resurrection," and, greatest success of all, "The Prodigal Son," the last-named being so much esteemed that it was chosen for performance, in 1773, at the installation of Lord North as Chancellor of Oxford University. It is recorded that, in acknowledgment, the authorities offered him an honorary degree, and that he gallantly refused it, disdaining to wear so cheap a distinction, and preferring to win his Mus. Doc. by examination in the ordinary course. In pursuance of this resolution, Arnold composed music to a poem by Hughes as his exercise. But the University was determined to be gracious, and Dr. Hayes, the then Professor at Oxford, returned the score unopened—"Sir, it is unnecessary to scrutinise the exercise of the author of the 'Prodigal Son'—an act of stately courtesy which, no doubt, Arnold appreciated, however much he would have preferred the customary ordeal. It was the fault of this musician that he covered too much ground. He wished to spread himself over the entire field of art, and had to beat himself out thin in consequence. Under an evil inspiration he purchased (1771) the Marybone Gardens, a place of amusement on the site of which some part of Baker Street now stands. For this speculation, we are told, "he composed some excellent burlettas, and other pieces, to which he added some ingenious fireworks." Accounts differ as to the result of this enterprise. According to one it succeeded till the ground lease fell in and the land was cleared for building; but, if another may be credited, Arnold was a loser by the venture. The less pleasant is more likely to be true. Following the death of Dr. Nares in 1783, Arnold became organist at the Chapel Royal, St. James's, and, in that capacity, acted as a sub-director at the Commemoration of Handel in Westminster Abbey a year later. In 1789 an appointment as manager of the performances in the Academy of Ancient Music crowned the honours of his active life. Arnold is now best remembered, not by his operas and oratorios, but by his labours as an editor. His edition of the works of Handel, though incomplete, is a monument upon which the tooth of time makes little impression; and the same may be said of his Cathedral Music in four volumes (1790), the issue of which was a service to sacred art then and now not to be over-estimated. Arnold died in Duke Street, Westminster, October 22, 1802, at the age of sixty-three. He had probably worn himself out.

In William Camden's "Remaines concerning Britain" (1657) there is, as many readers will recollect, a curious collection of epitaphs. Looking through these I met with an example headed, "Upon Master Parsons, Organist of Westminster," and running thus:

Death passing by, and hearing Parsons play,
 Stood much amazed at his depth of skill,
 And said, this Artist must with me away,
 (For Death bereaves us of the better skill),
 But let the Quire, while he keeps time, sing on,
 For Parsons rests, his service being done.

"W. H. H.," writing in Grove's Dictionary, refers to this epitaph, but does not quote it. We gather, however, that the subject of the quaint inscription is John Parsons, organist of St. Margaret's in 1616; organist of the Abbey in 1621. He died in 1623, and lies in the Abbey cloisters. The library of the Royal College of Music contains a MS. Burial Service from his pen.

Camden also cites the subjoined anagram on "Master John Dowland, the famous Lutenist."

Joannes Doulandus.
 Annos ludendo hauri.

At first sight this appears to be what old Camden would have called a licentious example, since there are sixteen letters in the name and seventeen in the anagram; while in the first there is a j and no i, in the second an i and no j. But the ingenious persons who, in old times, amused themselves with such exercises, refused the right of a letter to h, and dropped or added it as they pleased. Here it is added. They also considered certain members of the alphabet as interchangeable. Such were v and w, s and z; and, of course, as in the present case, i and j. The Dowland anagram conforms, therefore, to the law of its kind.

Everybody knows that Alfred Bunn was a theatrical manager and a dramatic author, but not, perhaps, that at one time he sought to rank himself among poetical satirists. In 1807 appeared (without publisher's or author's name) a volume, entitled "St. James's: A Satirical Poem in six Epistles to Mr. Crockford," and bearing a motto from Suetonius:

Summā sibi exactā licentiā jocandi.

The work is a severe attack on gambling, gamblers, and the ex-fishmonger, Crockford, who carried on the splendid "hell" in St. James's Street. Some sensation must have been made by the writer's boldness, as he does not spare the most exalted devotees of chance, only very slightly and ineffectively veiling their names by dropping a vowel or two. Concealed behind his anonymity, he, however, appears to have escaped the penalties generally imposed, in those days, upon whomsoever spake evil of dignities. A copy of the book lately came into my possession, having on its flyleaf this inscription: "To Mrs. Bunn, from her affectionate Son, the Author." The satire is decidedly smart, and gives one a higher estimate of Bunn's powers than can be gathered from his libretti. Taking an example almost at random, I find the author addressing Crockford as thus:

Behold thee at thy desk! Thy worth
Would make great Rhadamanthus wonder
To find a Judge of H—! on earth
As good as he is reckoned under.
There bowls of counters lie in heaps,
While bowls of wine are near for handing,
In which each man his reason steeps,
And then the first there's no withstanding.
Whilst thou, most prudently, to pay
All due attention to thy shop,
Though thou wilt give a pipe away,
Wont drink, thyself, a single drop.
And wise thou art to save this trouble,
(At least to my poor way of thinking.)
For thou canst see, each evening, double,
Without the slightest need of drinking.

At the close Bunn becomes hortatory, and, in a serious vein, sums up the evils of gambling in such lines as these:—

Behold that man whose hope, at last,
Lies in one solitary cast:
Who, agonised, thinks he'll restore
The thousands he has lost before:
With the deep goblet's purple stain
His maddening senses dares to drain,
And, rendered wild, then madly stakes
That which both house and fortune breaks
Without one monitor to tell
The hearts that it will break as well!
While thus become more deeply curst
By this belief—his last, his worst,
At every turn of Fortune crossed,
His life, and all its worth, are lost.

An amusing feature of the book is a series of elaborate notes to each Epistle, in which the author parades a wealth of references to classical and other authors. Some of the notes strike home. Here, for example, is a comment upon the line, "Crockford, the words I now indite": "I beg, Mr. Crockford, you will not misunderstand this (the last) word, and take any unnecessary alarm. I spell it without the c!" Did we lose a good satirist in an indifferent writer of lines for music?

THE STRONG MAN IN MUSIC.

THE earliest noteworthy instance of the strong singer was the redoubtable Stentor, whose achievements are immortalised in the deathless lines of Homer. Stentor was a herald by profession, and it is related of him that his voice was as loud as that of fifty men. Whether he was a robust tenor, a baritone, or a bass history relateth not; but the fact that his name has been converted into an adjective, and is habitually spelt with a little s, is, we take it, a sufficient proof of his lung power, as well as of the impression he created on his contemporaries. His memory is still green, and it affords striking proof of the influence that physical force has always exerted and still exerts to this day in the domain of music. If direct evidence be needed of the truth of this assertion we have only to point to the scenes enacted during the last three weeks at Covent Garden, where almost unexampled enthusiasm has been awakened by the greatest living exponent of the Stentorian school, Signor Tamagno.

Now while we are very far from contending that the mere exhibition of physical force is a thing to be admired in the realm of art, it may not be without profit to observe how far the possession of power and endurance, or the cultivation of the athletic instinct, has conduced to success in the annals of the art. To begin with, inasmuch as the commonest of all Philistine objections to the musical profession is that it tends to effeminacy, there can be no doubt that the general popularity of a singer or player is considerably enhanced by the knowledge that he can hold his own in other spheres of activity than those exclusively connected with his calling. In the case of instrumental executants the sedentary conditions of their life, and the care they have to take of their fingers, render it difficult for them to devote their attention to out-door or violent pursuits. A great pianist or violinist can never hope to excel as a wicket-keeper. It would not do for Herr Burmester, for example, to stand up to Richardson's or Woodcock's deliveries; or for M. Paderewski to keep goal in an Association football match. Still, if one looks at the list of musicians who have achieved distinction in the course of the century, it is quite refreshing to find what a creditable proportion have given the lie to the view that the service of art is incompatible with a taste for manly and athletic pursuits. Staudigl, one of the finest singers of the century, was a keen sportsman, who, while fulfilling his operatic engagements at Vienna, used constantly to spend his days in hunting expeditions in the neighbourhood. As for Mendelssohn, it is well known that, though not endowed with a robust physique, there were few pastimes in which he did not excel. He was an excellent billiard player, very fond of gymnastics and riding, and a good dancer and swimmer.

Rubinstein's immense strength was conclusively exhibited at the keyboard. As for Ole Bull, who was a splendidly made man, there is a delightful story of how Liszt, in the year 1840, once ordered him to execute summary punishment on a manager who had endeavoured to sow dissension between the violinist and the pianist. The culprit was invited to breakfast, after which he was subjected to a searching cross-examination, and finally Liszt pronounced sentence as follows: "Ole Bull, I charge you to take this man and hold him at arm's length out of the window"—they were in a room on the third storey—"until he confesses." The order was promptly carried out, for Ole Bull had muscles of steel, and the wretched manager was kept dangling in mid air until he had confessed his misdeeds. A few years later on a Mississippi steamboat, some rough fellows having insulted Ole Bull, he challenged the strongest of them to a wrestling match and threw him over his head. Subsequently Ole Bull heard of the same fellow as having gone to an editor to call him to account for an adverse criticism on his playing, and expressing his readiness to fight for "the strongest fiddler he had ever seen, anyhow." Lablache was a Stentor and Samson in one. "His strength," writes Mr. Julian Marshall, "was enormous. As Leporello he sometimes carried off under one arm, apparently without effort, the troublesome Masetto, represented by Giubilei, a man of the full height and weight of ordinary men! Again, in an interval of tedious rehearsing, he was once seen on the stage to pick up with one hand a double bass that was standing in the orchestra, examine it at arm's length, and gently replace it where he had found it! The force of his voice exceeded when he chose the tone of the instruments that accompanied it and the noise and clamour of the stage; nothing drowned his portentous notes, which rang through the house like the booming of a great bell." Certainly his strength was no drawback to Lablache, who was not only one of the greatest singers, but one of the most honourable men who ever adorned the profession, and who deserves to live long in grateful remembrance if only for his generosity in defraying, out of his own pocket, the fees of the operatic singers who took part in the performance of Mozart's "Requiem" after Beethoven's death. Coming down to later times, it is not too much to say that Wagnerian opera has been a regular school for the training of vocal athletes, in which the race has nearly always been to the strong in the literal sense of the word. A powerful physique is absolutely indispensable to those who aspire to sustain the heroic rôles of Tristan or Isolde, Siegfried or Brünnhilde. There can be little doubt that it was to his exertions in singing and impersonating the first-mentioned of the above parts that the untimely death of Schnorr von Carolsfeld was to be ascribed. In the case of those who can stand the strain, on the other hand, the exertion only seems to develop and invigorate the physique. Certain it is that the best known of the Wagnerian singers of the past thirty years or so have almost, without exception, been of a remarkably robust type. To this class—in view of their present allegiance to the Wagnerian cause—must now be referred the MM. de Reszke, both of them men of powerful build as well as keen sportsmen, their union of musical talent with a keen and practical interest in horses proving them to be true sons of Apollo, who was not only the god of music, but a notable huntsman and the best of celestial whips.

But after all it is not necessary to go abroad in search of evidence to rebut the Philistine fallacy that musicians are unmanly and unathletic. Take our singers, and consider how entirely inapplicable the former epithet, at any rate, is to such men as Mr. Santley, Signor Foli, and Mr. Lloyd amongst our veterans. Take the case of Dr. Hubert Parry, who, but for a rule forbidding the same boy to hold both posts, would have been captain of both football teams at Eton; who in his college days was an excellent cricketer and is still a fine swimmer, a fearless yachtsman, and a member of the London Skating Club. Among the leading younger artists there are few who, within the limits imposed by their professional duties, do not cultivate their athletic instincts. Messrs. Norman Salmond, Watkin Mills, and Plunket Greene are all devotees of golf, a game, by the way, to the fascinations of which Mr. Lloyd has latterly succumbed. The newly elected Mendelssohn scholar, we learn, is an excellent cricketer. In the ranks of the amateurs this divided allegiance to art and athletics could be illustrated ad infinitum. But enough has been said to show that so far from the union being impracticable, it is manifested, with the happiest results, in precisely those members of the profession who are its greatest ornaments.

WE were fortunately enabled, by means of a printed slip inserted in our last number, after we had gone to press, to give the first announcement of the success of the plaintiffs in the appeal of the action, Novello and Co. v. The Oliver Ditson Co., judgment in which was delivered by the American Appellate Court as recently as April 25. We now print verbatim the judgment of the Court, consisting of Justices Putnam, Webb, and Aldrich, who were unanimous in affirming the judgment of Justice Colt in the First, or Circuit, Court.

Per Curiam. We are satisfied with the conclusion of the Circuit Court in this case, and adopt the opinion of the learned judge of that court, except that we do not deem it necessary to investigate the history of the bill which resulted in the copyright statute of March 3, 1891, 26 Stat. 1106, under question in these proceedings, or to determine how far that history is pertinent to the construction of the act.

The case deals with copyrighted matters alone, which are only the musical parts, or notations, of complainants' publications. We are not called on to consider a case in which more than the notation is covered by a copyright.

That musical compositions, as such, differ in the view of the copyright law from books, as such, necessarily follows from the fact that when musical compositions were first made copyrightable, the penalty for infringing was made expressly and distinctively other than that for infringing the copyrighted book. Act of February 3, 1831, Sections 6 and 7, 4 Stat. 437, 438. And it so stands in the present statute. Act of March 3, 1891, Sections 7 and 8; 26 Stat. 1107. There are other particulars in which the statutes make the same distinction; but in this one the result is unavoidable. What were copyrighted here were clearly musical compositions, and nothing else; and the distinction thus made by these penal provisions cannot be maintained, unless the result reached by the Circuit Court is accepted.

The word lithograph, found in the proviso in section three of the statute under consideration, represents only a sub-division of the matters embraced in the word print in the same section, which gets its meaning and limitation, for the purposes of this statute, from its immediate association with the words "engraving, cut." This is emphasized by the third section of the act of June 18, 1874, 18 Stat. 78, which expressly limits the word to pictorial illustrations or works connected with the fine arts. Moreover, the introduction of the proviso by the words "in the case" constitutes a legislative selection from what precedes it, and shows that the qualifying effect of the proviso was intended to be limited to a part only of the things named in the body of the section. These words necessarily make the whole section in pari materia.

It is true that in some parts of the statutes the words book, print, and musical composition refer to the intellectual conception as the essential element, and in other parts may refer more particularly to the material form in which it is expressed; but nowhere does either element exclusively exist, because no intellectual conception is copyrightable until it has taken material shape. Therefore there is no reason for holding that the use of the words "book, photograph, chromo, or lithograph" in the proviso involves a departure from the distinctive idea appertaining to either in other parts of the statutes touching the subject-matter of copyright.

If the statutes were of doubtful meaning, the history of the bill, the omission of the words "dramatic composition" from some of the provisions of the statutes, the contemporaneous construction by the departments or officers of the United States, and perhaps other propositions urged upon either side, might have weight; but in a case so clear as the one at bar we do not deem it necessary to invoke such aids, or to note the conditions or limitations under which such considerations should weigh in the interpretation of doubtful statutory provisions.

The decree of the Circuit Court is affirmed.

In congratulating the plaintiffs, and the English music publishers, upon the successful outcome of the battle they have fought, we would call attention to the far-reaching effect of the decision thereby secured; for, in fighting on their own behalf, the plaintiffs necessarily became the champions of foreign publishers also, and the benefactors of the music composers of all countries which are admitted to the benefits of American Copyright Law. But in congratulating the victorious plaintiffs and those who made common cause with them, we wish to place on record our feeling of sincere regret that the death of Mr. Chauncy Smith, the senior Counsel for the defendants, who was buried on the day before the case came on for argument in the Appellate Court, should have deprived the defendants of his valuable help at the final hearing of the case; they will, however, forgive us if we express our opinion that that sad event can hardly have had any material effect upon the decision, more especially as American Rules of Court require Counsel's arguments to be submitted to the Court in print prior to the hearing. We also venture to think that the plaintiffs' case was unanswerable.

NOTTEBOHM spent well-nigh a lifetime in showing how Beethoven evolved masterpieces from mysterious germs; how he rapidly noted down thoughts as they occurred to him, and then worked slowly adding, developing, and almost invariably modifying, until he had reached, so far as was possible, the ideal picture of his mind. And he adopted the same method, whether for a small Bagatelle or for a big Symphony, or even Opera. At Beethoven's death, his musical books and papers, among which were the famous Sketch-Books, were sold by auction. The dispersion of the latter is much to be regretted; the books certainly do not reveal all the secrets of the master's genius, but, of their kind, they are unique; in many ways, too, they are interesting and useful to musicians. And not only were the Sketch-Books dispersed, but from some pages were torn out, accidentally, or, probably in most cases, purposely, by those into whose hands the books had fallen, to present to friends, or even to sell. Any attempt to gather together these leaves scattered over the world is worthy of commendation. It would be well to have these precious relics in as perfect a form as possible. The authorities of the British Museum have recently purchased eight loose sheets, containing principally sketches for the great Quartet in B flat (Op. 130). To this work the composer devoted much time and attention, as we know from a sketch-book of the year 1825, preserved in the Berlin Royal Library. These loose leaves have several sketches of the first movement—of the principal theme, of the passage leading to the second theme, and of the Coda—of the major section of the Presto, and of the Andante. There are also one or two allusions to the C sharp minor Quartet. There is, indeed, one thought—which is also noted down in crotchets, and with a continuation; and, again, thus—

In its first form it may refer to the Coda of the last movement of the C sharp minor Quartet; in the crotchet form it recalls, so far, at any rate, as the succession of notes is concerned, a passage in the Allegretto of the Eighth Symphony. On one of the sheets are to be found, underneath some notes—apparently a recitative—the words—"Alle gewaltsame that misfällt ja den Göttern. Jugend ehren nur u. Gerechtigkeit nützt den Menschen." There is an undecipherable word (or words) after ehren (where the blank is left). Another interesting remark, showing how Beethoven planned out order and keys of his movements, runs thus: "Oder Adagio in Cis ml (i.e., moll?) hernach des dur." It occurs under which probably refers to the opening Adagio of the C sharp minor Quartet.

It will be fresh in the recollection of our readers that, in our issue for April, we commented upon a ridiculous statement, made by Mr. H. Davey, of Brighton, that "Polyphony was invented by the Englishman, John Dunstable." In the course of our remarks we said "Everyone possessing even a superficial acquaintance with the history of music during the Middle Ages knows that polyphonic music existed as early as the eleventh century, and that dozens of examples in two, three, and four parts, dating from the twelfth, thirteenth, and fourteenth centuries, are extant." It now appears that Mr. Davey is without even that "superficial acquaintance" with the facts here enumerated; for in an article from his pen which appears in a contemporary, he shows conclusively that his knowledge of the polyphonic music composed during the three centuries preceding the birth of Dunstable is confined to the famous "Sumer is i cumen in," which is, of course, familiar to every schoolboy. That, at any rate, is the only piece he refers to, throughout the article, as existing before Dunstable, and of it he says: "It is an oasis in the desert where musicians wandered for centuries until John Dunstable led the way into the Promised Land"—which is rather pretty, but, unfortunately, not true. Mr. Davey quotes several authors, ancient and modern, who have asserted that Dunstable "invented" Polyphony—some even call it "counterpoint"; but this, we take it, proves only that they know the facts of the case as little as he does. Mr. Davey, we understand, is writing a "History of English Music." We trust that before completing this work he will pay a visit to the British Museum and glance over the following publications, which, though but a few of many that could be named, will serve to sufficiently enlighten him for the present:—

- I.—Proceedings of the Musical Association, fourteenth session, containing a Lecture on old English music by Dr. Mee, in which is quoted a two-part-song copied from a Cornish MS. of the eleventh century.
- II.—Coussemaker's "L'Art Harmonique aux XII.^{ème} and XIII.^{ème} siècles" (Paris, 1865). In this work there are no less than fifty compositions, sacred and secular, in three and four parts, by various composers of the twelfth and thirteenth centuries. They occupy, in this volume, 123 quarto pages.
- III.—Coussemaker's "Messe du XIII.^{ème} siècle" (Tournai, 1861). This is an edition in modern notation of a MS. in the Cathedral at Tournai, containing a Mass in three parts, written at the end of the thirteenth or the beginning of the fourteenth century. In a preface, M. Coussemaker says: "Comparing the Tournai Mass with other compositions of the end of the thirteenth century . . . we see, especially in the Gloria and Credo, an ease and freedom of melodic movement in the parts that are to be found in no other contemporary composition."
- IV.—The late Mr. John Curwen's "Commonplaces of Music," part K, containing musical illustrations to his first course of "Euing" Lectures, and the first thirty-eight pages of which include eight vocal pieces, in two and three parts, of the eleventh, twelfth, thirteenth, and fourteenth centuries.

When Mr. Davey has looked at these works, and also read the article "Dunstable" in Grove's Dictionary, his delusion that "polyphony" (which, by the way, he also refers to in his article as "counterpoint" and "composition") did not exist till the fifteenth century will, we fancy, be dispelled.

old resource of "training" by a "competent professor," oblivious of the fact that there is no technique in the art of conducting an orchestra, the only requirements being an acute ear, a masterful personality, and enormous practice. Will some one inform us how either of these is to be imparted by a professor and of what his competency is to consist? As a matter of fact, attempts are now and again made in our principal music schools to assist any student who may desire to gain insight into the art of direction, but the results cannot, in the nature of things, be very striking. It is of paramount necessity that the conductor of an orchestra shall be able to command the implicit obedience of his followers: what confidence can a mere student, whom they know to be learning his business, inspire in players who thoroughly know theirs? No, there is only one way to become a conductor, eminent or otherwise, and to know this way you have but to do as Messrs. Richter, Levi, Mottl, and the rest have done—slave away as a player and then slave away at the conductor's desk. Where is the opportunity, you ask? That is quite another matter. But conducting is an art that can only be acquired, not imparted.

THE truth that lies in the saying that the occasion makes the man, is particularly applicable in this matter. No town in the Fatherland is considered complete without an opera house and a local orchestra. The art of conducting is therefore cultivated to an extent, and under conditions most favourable to its mastery. Give our conductors the same opportunities and then—but not till then—it will be fair to institute comparisons. At present the skill shown by English conductors may really be spoken of as remarkable, considering the few opportunities they have for the acquirement of their difficult art. Another point: the credit due to our orchestral players seems to be entirely overlooked. The conductor who asks for a new reading of a well-known orchestral masterpiece demands from his forces renunciation of long-established methods and forms of thought which call for no small effort and self-abnegation. Thus the responsiveness with which the requirements of foreign conductors have recently been met not only testifies in a striking manner to the remarkable abilities of our instrumentalists, but has shown them to be the possessors of that sympathetic quality of mind which is one of the chief attributes of the artist. It may confidently be affirmed that in no country could such perfection of orchestral performance be attained with so few rehearsals as in England. There can be no question as to the skill and vivifying influence of the readings of our German visitors, but let us not forget the medium which enables them to show that skill. Above all, we would protest against the present inclination to place the conductor in the position of the star prima donna.

No more suitable recognition of the eminent services rendered to musical art in this country by Mr. August Manns could have been devised than the Reception which was given in his honour at the Grafton Galleries on April 30. The guests included the Duke of Saxe-Coburg and Gotha, the leading members of every branch of the musical profession, and a number of distinguished representatives of the sister arts. The address, read by Sir George Grove, and Mr. Manns's reply to it, were in excellent taste. The Crystal Palace Orchestra played a delightful selection of music by Mr. Manns himself and some of the English composers whose works were first brought

A STRIKING example of the too-prevalent belief that everything in the present day is to be taught and nothing learn't is afforded by the suggestions of some of our contemporaries upon the alleged lack of orchestral conductors in this country. Instead of considering the actual life-history of the three or four eminent German conductors whose prowess stirs such feelings of envy and despair, the writers fly to the out under his bâton; and the souvenir programme given to each guest contained an excellent portrait of Mr. Manns and a prose poem by Mr. Joseph Bennett, which exactly expressed the feelings of those assembled; and at the supper which took place afterwards, the toast of Mr. Manns's health, proposed by the Duke, was received with the greatest enthusiasm. Add to this that the arrangements, which had been carried out by the committee's honorary secretary, Mr. Hermann Klein, worked without a hitch, and it will be seen that the event is likely to be pleasantly remembered for many years to come.

It has probably not escaped the notice of those among our readers who are musical graduates, that Bachelors of Music of Oxford or Cambridge are allowed under the new order of things to take an ad eundem degree in Dublin, and then proceed to the Doctorate in that University, under prescribed conditions. This will be to many a privilege, and we have confidence that those in authority in Dublin will take care to prevent such a privilege from being abused.

FACTS, RUMOURS, AND REMARKS.

An Edinburgh correspondent sends the following advertisement, taken from the Scotsman: "Wanted, for select band of ten performers, three first violins, two second, viola, cello, contra-basso, pianist, and harmoniumist capable of playing from pianoforte score; must be full-toned, expressive players, and devoted to music. Particulars on application to E. Ames, Eskbank." Is some Cræsus in North Britain setting up a private band?

Clifton Society says of Miss Olive Harcourt that she "possesses a pure soprano voice which reaches the phenomenal range of four octaves." Phenomenal indeed, unless, as a Bristol correspondent suggests, a reporter heard that the lady could produce four F's, and then set down four octaves. Some reader of this paragraph may be able to give us the facts.

I AM much obliged by the offer of a Devises reader to send for inspection a volume containing "a very curious old song, entitled 'The Death of Tom Moody, the noted Whipper-in,'" by William Shield. "There are," says my correspondent, "very curious directions as to how it should be sung printed between the clefs—viz., 'In moderate time, but alternately with animation and dejection,' 'with animation,' 'dejectedly,' 'reviving,' 'desponding,' &c." The directions are certainly curious, and inserted probably by some other hand than that of Shield. "Tom Moody" is one of the best known of its composer's ditties, and used to be sung at every high dinner with much solemnity and many view halloos.

"GALLANT little Wales" has put in a claim to have some of her national airs in the repertory of the Royal Exchange chimes. If Scotland and Ireland are to be represented, why not that other "Celtic fringe," as Lord Salisbury would call the twelve counties and Monmouthshire? Why not, indeed? We shall presently hear that the Kingdom of Man is stirring in the matter, and perhaps the Channel Islands also.

HERE is a curious want, as expressed in the advertisement columns of a contemporary: "Required, an Instrument made to copy the full compass of a tiger's roar." As letters are to be addressed to a firm of naturalists, we may assume that the instrument is destined for the interior of a stuffed tiger; but why is it to copy the compass of the beast's roar and not the roar itself?

A CORRESPONDENT calls attention to a remarkable advertisement issued in the provinces by a gentleman who styles himself "the pioneer of his art (vide Press). He is a professor, musical composer, author, song-writer, arranger, &c., &c.; member of the London Conservatoire of Music; member of the International Literary Association; holder of London Diploma of Honour for Excellence in Musical Composition; holder of Sloper Certificate and Award of Merit; and authorised composer and arranger to the élite of the profession. I regret my complete inability to appraise the value of these distinctions, and especially of that described as the Sloper Certificate and Award of Merit. A friend tells me that the conductors of Ally Sloper's Journal sometimes confer an honour so called; but it surely cannot be to this that the advertiser refers. Then what is the International Literary Association? and what the London Diploma of Honour? If the advertiser wishes to be accepted at his full value, he should enlighten the public on these points.

AN American paper informs its readers that after the marriage of Mr. Curzon, recently celebrated, the wedded pair "received the congratulations of their friends, the choir thereafter intoning the Hallelujah chorus from Handel's 'Messiah.'" The word "intoning," in relation to church services, has a specific meaning. How does it apply to a performance of the "Hallelujah"? It may be that the reporter was strong on "local colour."

THE office of this journal has received the prospectus of an "Imperial Pianoforte College for Gentlewomen," the object of which is to promote "a legitimate and sound system of pianoforte playing and teaching." The gentlewomen are to be taught by female professors, so that "parents can send their daughters with entire confidence," especially as the College will generally be conducted "on the most refined principles."

It is further stated that for the purpose of carrying on this institution, a joint-stock company will be formed, with a capital of £3,000, in 300 shares of £10 each; one-half of the capital to be allotted to the promoter in fully paid-up shares, the remainder to be the "treasury or working capital." It is further stipulated in the articles of agreement that no person shall subscribe for more than fifteen shares, and that no shares shall be sold without the knowledge and consent of the promoter, nor until first offered to the promoter at the actual value of the shares at the time of offering.

A LETTER accompanying the prospectus and articles of agreement states prophetically that the College "will be attended with financial as well as artistic success"; also, that "it is not presumptuous (sic) in asserting that a pianoforte College is much needed"; also that "the first subscribers will have the privilege and honour of being founders of the institution"; and, further, that "it is intended to have the College under the patronage of Royalty." Ladies and gentlemen with money to invest will see that now is their time.

I AM indebted to Mr. William Brown, of Durham, for some interesting information with regard to John Brimlei, the old-time Organist of the Cathedral, whose epitaph, forwarded by Mr. Stephen Stratton, appeared in the March number of this journal. Mr. Brown writes that John Brimlei was master of the song-school, and organist when the monks were still in possession of the Abbey, and quotes, in proof, from the "Rites of Durham," where, it is said, "Our Ladies' Mass" was sung each day in the Galilee, "with certain deacons and quiristers, the Master playing upon a paire of faire organs." An interlineation notes that the master was called Mr. John Brimleir.

CONTINUING, my correspondent writes: "He was at his post in the Cathedral during the abortive rising in the North in 1569. Oliver Ashe, curate of St. Giles's, Durham, deposed that whilst a priest named Holmes was saying Mass, when the sacring bell rang, he looked toward the priest but could not discern the elevation; whereupon he looked up to Mr. Brimlei, then in the loft over the quire door, and smiled at him. Examined himself, John Brimlei, Master of the Choristers in the Cathedral Church of Durham, aged sixty-seven, admitted that he was twice at High Mass, but he sang not himself at them, but played the organs, and did divers times help to sing Salvaes at Mattins and Evensong, and played on the organs, and went in procession, as others did, after the Cross. He owned also that he put forward the Service, and instructed the choristers in such things as they did in the Quire pertaining to service at that time. He expressed his contrition, seems to have conformed, and to have been confirmed in possession of his post, for he was at it when death overtook him in 1576. From which it appears that Master John Brimlei had not in him the stuff of which martyrs are made."

THE following extract from the "Rites of Durham" show how Church music was provided for in pre-Reformation times:—

There were three paire of Organs belonging to the Quire, for maintenance of God's service, and the better celebratunge thereof.

One of the fairest paire of the three did stand over the Quire dore, only opened and played upon at principall Feasts; the pipes beinge all of most fine wood and workmanship, very faire, partly gilded upon the inside and the outside of the leaves and covers up to the topp, with branches and flowers finely gilted, with the name of Jesus (I.H.S.) gilted with gold. There was but two paire more of them in all England of the same makinge, one paire in Yorke, and another in Paules (London).

The second paire stood on the north side of the Quire, being never played upon but when the four Doctors of the Church were read, viz., Augustine, Ambrose, Gregorye, & Jerome, beinge a faire paire of large organs, called the CRYERS.

The third paire was daily used at ordinary service.

I REGRET that earlier notice has not been taken of a communication from Mr. Joshua D. Horwood, of Hull, with reference to musical epitaphs in Durham Cathedral and elsewhere. In the first place, Mr. Horwood supplies further particulars concerning two Durham organists whose epitaphs were quoted in THE MUSICAL TIMES for March. He says: "John Brimlei was organist of Durham Cathedral from 1557 to 1576, and W. Greggs was organist at the same Cathedral from 1682 to 1710." My correspondent sends, also, an English translation of a Latin epitaph (now effaced), which was to be seen in the South transept of York Minster: "Here lie the ashes of Kirby, an excellent chanter and incomparable organist. He sang extraordinary songs to charming tunes. He was the boast, glory and honour of this church. Great were his probity, wisdom and virtue, and his understanding, morality and genius remarkable." Does any reader know more than the epitaph tells concerning this paragon of virtue and skill?

I AM further indebted to Mr. Horwood for an epitaph copied by himself, many years ago, from a tomb in the North transept of Chester Cathedral: "Here lieth the body of Thomas Spence, who departed this life January 30, 1809, aged 88 years, 79 of which he served as a chorister of this Cathedral." Can Dr. (Chester) Bridge discover any particulars regarding this grand old singer's life?

SOME time has passed since a cutting from a Devonshire paper came to hand, by favour of a correspondent; but it is never too late for a good thing. The slip in question contains some remarks upon a Concert given by a local professor, from which I learn that a part-song, by Joachim Raff, was sung, and one of Mendelssohn's "Liede ohne Wortes" played—so played as that the "blurring often noticeable in some performers" was not observed. It appears, further, that a lady's singing of "Hark! the Lark," had "a grace particularly facile," and that somebody's new setting of "Crossing the Bar" "entails rather a large range, but the music is effective and masterly, and, as interpreted by Madame —, exceedingly picturesque." For the purposes of this entertainment, a local firm "loaned the Bechstein concert grand and a cottage."

THE prize offered by Miss Fanny Moody and Mr. Charles Manners, for the best opera composed under the conditions laid down, has been won by Mr. Allick Maclean, with a work entitled "Petrucchio." Forty-three compositions were sent in, of which three came from Australia and one from Malta. The last-named received the special commendation of the judges.

JOSEPH BENNETT.

MR. COWEN'S NEW OPERA, "HAROLD."

IN view of the forthcoming production, at Covent Garden, of Mr. Cowen's "Harold," the following sketch of its main features will no doubt be read with interest.

The plot, as adapted by Sir Edward Malet from the many and conflicting accounts of the history of Harold, is briefly as follows:—

Act I.—Harold, in love with Edith, returns secretly from banishment, and meets the Duke of Normandy in Earl Alfnoth's (Edith's father's) castle, whither he (the Duke) has sought a short rest on his journey homeward from visiting King Edward. The King, having ascertained Harold's whereabouts, sends to arrest him; but the Duke, on the advice of his trusty friend Malet, protects him and takes him to Normandy.

Act II.—The Duke tells Harold that King Edward has bequeathed the crown to him, and offers to bestow upon Harold the hand of his daughter, Princess Adela (who, the more easily to aid her father's plot, feigns a passionate love for Harold), if he will assist him to become king. Harold, knowing himself to be as much a prisoner as a guest, and in the hope of obtaining his freedom, consents, and swears upon sacred relics in the Cathedral to aid the Duke. News of King Edward's approaching death arrives and Harold is allowed to depart.

Act III.—The funeral of King Edward the Confessor at Westminster. Harold and Edith meet; she, believing him false to her, has taken vows. She learns, too late, that he still loves her, and begs him, as a last request, to accept the crown, which, by the love and unanimous wish of the people, has been offered to him. This he is eventually persuaded to do.

Act IV.—Edith, in the cloister, has a vision of Harold before the Battle of Hastings. The finding of the body of Harold by Edith on the battlefield. Victorious entry of William the Conqueror.

The music of "Harold" is perhaps more on the lines of Mr. Cowen's opera "Thorgim" than on those of his later work "Signa"—that is to say, that the lyrical portion is comparatively subordinate to the dramatic.

The opera opens immediately with a Hunting Chorus, sung with the curtain down, which has somewhat of an old English flavour about it—

This is followed by a short orchestral prelude based upon the same themes, then a repetition of the above chorus as the curtain rises. The ensuing scene between Edith and her father, and, later on, Harold, is largely made up of the following motives—

The entry of the Duke of Normandy is preceded by a short theme of some dignity—

This is quickly followed by a short chorus of mutual welcome between the Saxons and Normans, to which again an old English character is sought to be given—

Next of importance comes an air for Edith with female chorus, and graceful dance, instrumented in a dainty and fanciful manner with harp, cor anglais, bells, &c.—

The following solo for the Duke is adapted (with considerable alteration in time, &c.) from one of the most ancient English airs extant—

The orchestration throughout this has a different colour with almost every phrase of two bars. The air is not allowed to finish, but is interrupted by the entrance of the king's soldiers in search of Harold. The music from this point to the end of the Act is mostly dramatic in form, and contains several other themes which have not occurred previously, but which we have not the space to quote.

Act II. begins with a short prelude based upon two themes, the first of which may be termed the motive of Princess Adela's feigned love for Harold, the second being the refrain of the solo which she sings on the rising of the curtain—

The combination of the saxophone and guitar in this solo is something of a novelty. In the ensuing duet between Adela and Harold considerable use is made of No. 8, together with new material, and the whole is worked up to a big climax. The Duke of Normandy's appearance on the scene is the occasion for several more new themes, one of which—occurs frequently throughout the rest of the Act.

In the Cathedral scene, which forms the second part of Act II., the religious element naturally prevails to a large extent. It opens with a hymn for women's and boys' voices, with which is combined a sort of Latin chant for the Monks—

The following soliloquy for the Duke has an air of mysteriousness about it in keeping with the time and place. Upon Harold's entrance, what may be termed the Oath motive—first appears, given out pp by the brass. This, and the orchestral counter-melody to which the monks' chant at the beginning of the scene is sung, are the materials of which the greater part of the end of this Act are composed.

The Funeral March, which opens Act III., has the following for its principal theme—

After a melodious air for Edith, in G flat major, the march and chorus is resumed, but is interrupted by the entry of Harold. The music, hitherto solemn, now changes to a more joyous character. The duet between Edith and Harold, which soon occurs, is a lengthy one, and alternates between sadness and passionate despair; we quote one of its principal phrases—

The whole Finale to the Act, which should prove stirring in representation, is conceived in an heroic vein.

Three themes are worthy of being quoted—

This occurs for the first time when Malet taunts Harold with the way in which he has broken his oath to Duke William, and is afterwards (in Act IV.) used as the signal of the Norman trumpets.

is the theme of the Finale proper to the Act.

does not appear until almost the last bars before the curtain falls, and is used in Act IV. as the trumpet signal of the English forces.

Act IV. begins with a rather lengthy prelude, in which most of the principal themes hitherto used in the opera occur in rapid succession, sometimes singly, sometimes combined together, and may be taken as a resumé of the events in Harold's life. The ensuing scene, for Edith alone, though consisting of almost entirely new material, need not be quoted. The vision of Harold's tent gives rise to a short Brindisi to Victory, sung by himself and his knights, in which an old English flavour is again apparent—

This finishes abruptly, and, as the vision changes to that of the Saxon forces marching to battle, so the character of the music gradually becomes more martial, working up to a big ff, to be again abruptly concluded as Edith starts up from her sleep. The orchestral interlude which follows and describes the Battle of Hastings is largely made up of the Oath motive (No. 12) and the trumpet signals of the Saxon and Norman forces (Nos. 15 and 17).

There is little new material in the concluding scene, "The finding of Harold's body," which is made as short and concise as the situation permits. The actual Finale to the opera consists of a repetition of the old English air, sung by Duke William in Act I. (No. 7), given out by all the men's voices and full orchestral effects, somewhat in the form of a chorale.

The cast of the opera as it will be performed at Covent Garden is as follows:—Edith, Madame Albani; Princess Adela, Mdlle. Meisslinger; Harold, Mr. Philip Brozel; William, Mr. David Bispham; Malet, Mr. Richard Green; Alfnth and Archbishop Stigand, Mr. Dever; Siward, Mr. Barr.

ROYAL OPERA, COVENT GARDEN.

THE season at this house began on the 13th ult., since which date and the time of writing the following operas have been played in order of mention: Verdi's "Otello" (twice), "Mefistofele," "Le Prophète"; "Philemon et Baucis," "Pagliacci," "Lohengrin," "Il Trovatore" (twice), "Fra Diavolo," "Falstaff," and "Carmen." Concerning these works, as such, there is no more to be said; regarding the choice of them, however, attention may be called to the impartial way in which the manager deals with the various "schools." If this may be taken as reflecting the eclecticism of the public, there is double cause for satisfaction. Here it is worth while to note the almost enthusiastic reception given to "Il Trovatore," which for some time previous had been unrepresented. So great was the "run" on the box-office that the manager decided upon a repetition performance before the first had taken place. This appears to us significant. For ourselves we are not particularly fond of "Il Trovatore," which, though it have the merits of its order, has also many of the defects; but the reception of the work, the obvious pleasure with which the public came back to it, seems indicative of a reaction towards melodic as distinct from declamatory and symphonic opera. Let us have what is excellent in both forms, and so be happy all round; to which end we welcome the renewed success of our old friends Leonora, Manrico, Azucena, and the rest.

Though nothing, critical or appreciative, need be said of the works so far produced, notice must be taken of some among the artists who helped to place them before us, and especially of Mr. Tamagno, most robust among strenuous tenors. Those who heard this gentleman at the Lyceum a few years since were prepared for a big voice and mastering energy, but the actuality must have surprised even them. Mr. Tamagno seems to grow with the size of the theatre, and was just as overwhelming in the "Garden" as in the smaller house off the Strand. Equally exciting, too, were his abounding energy and the passion that, at times, seems to pass, in pure overflow, from artist to audience. But these are not all Mr. Tamagno's merits. He was rough and even rude in "Il Trovatore"; in "Otello" he presented not only a boldly conceived but a finely wrought character, perfect to a gesture and eloquent in every touch. The part of the Moor seems to be by far his best. Mr. Pessina, the excellent "creator" of Falstaff in this country, played Iago to Tamagno's Otello, but had it not in face or heart to be villainous enough. He sang well, however. The Desdemona was Madame Albani. Miss Macintyre made her re-entry in "Mefistofele." She has improved in various ways since last amongst us, but her middle notes are extremely weak. The Scottish soprano has, we are glad to see, ripened acquaintance with self-restraint of late. Madame Fanny Moody made a successful appearance in "Pagliacci," à propos to which let us note with satisfaction that the manager is opening his stage door to English-speaking artists. Mr. Bispham, for example, played Lord Alcañch in "Fra Diavolo," with Madame Amadi as his Lady; Miss De Lussan was Anne Page in "Falstaff," and Mr. O'Mara has also been heard. This is as it should be, and as it might have been long ago but for prejudice and the opposition of other interests. Among old acquaintances now at the "Garden" are Mesdames Engle, Janson, Ravogli; Messrs. De Lucia, Pini-Corsi, Arimondi, Castelmarty, Plançon, and Ancona. The Conductor's duties have been shared by Messrs. Mancinelli, Beviniani, and Seppilli.

PHILHARMONIC SOCIETY.

THE third Concert of this Society's season took place in Queen's Hall, on May Day, which joyous time, big with the promise of physical delights, was celebrated by a display of much physical strength. An observer of English manners, as far back as the spacious days of good Queen Bess, remarked that our nation is fond of showing gladness by loud noises. We do not seem to have changed, and this May Day Concert ended with the blasts of the "Walkurenritt" and the thunders of Berlioz's "Symphonie Fantastique." Here was not exactly a classic celebration, but, considering the season, those who object should be lenient; the Philharmonic directors, appealing to everybody, naturally aim to please everybody, and there are many who find pleasure in the fantastic horrors of the Symphony and sensations of delight in the effect which the Wagner piece has upon nerve-centres. The more sober part of the programme contained Sullivan's Overture to Part II, "Light of the World"; Max Bruch's first and best Violin Concerto, and a scena from "Euryanthe," sung by Mr. David Bispham. Bruch's work had as chief interpreter the clever artist, Miss Frida Scotta, of whose ability to deal satisfactorily with such music no reader needs assurance.

The fourth Concert, given on the 17th ult., opened with a genuine novelty in the form of an Overture styled "Leonatus and Imogen," embodying impressions of Shakespeare's "Cymbeline," and composed by Dr. G. J. Bennett, a young musician whose name has become familiar and whose future, given perseverance, promises high distinction. This is not a programme overture, being as complete when dissociated from the Shakespearian characters in the title as when heard with reference to them. It may, therefore, be examined for itself alone, and, so looked at, presents some good and encouraging features. Its themes are by no means lacking in character and distinction; the workmanship shown in their treatment is sound and often ingenious; the orchestration shows knowledge of effect, and a sense of climax is not absent. It is thus a good academical exercise, plus feeling and significance in the themes. Dr. Bennett now needs to cultivate the art of so treating his subjects as to develop their melodic possibilities. In some degree the Overture shows this, but each theme contains happy thoughts capable of throwing off others, and so keeping interest alive. This treatment, far more than simple repetition under varied conditions, should engage the attention of young composers. A thousand examples by the great masters lie ready to hand. Other features of this Concert were the "Pastoral" Symphony, admirably played under Sir A. C. Mackenzie; Stavenhagen's Pianoforte Concerto in B minor, with the clever composer at the solo instrument; and Ernst's arduous Violin Concerto in F sharp minor, with the difficulties of which Mr. Burmester's wonderful executive skill seemed to toy.

ROYAL CHORAL SOCIETY.

WE have now to chronicle in few words the concluding performance of a season which has, in an artistic sense—and we believe also financially—been successful. That there is still much vitality in Haydn's melodious Oratorio, the "Creation," which some are pleased to deem old-fashioned, was conclusively shown by the immense attendance at the Albert Hall on the 2nd ult. Certainly the list of soloists was very strong, for Madame Albani, Mr. Edward Lloyd, and Mr. Andrew Black are names for concert-givers to conjure with. Of course, the tuneful choruses offered no difficulty whatever to Sir Joseph Barnby's splendidly trained forces; and thus with every ground for satisfaction the Royal Choral Society concluded its labours until the ensuing autumn.

WAGNER CONCERTS.

THE first of this season's series of Mr. Schultz-Curtius's Wagner Concerts, which was given at Queen's Hall on April 25, was conducted by Herr Hermann Levi, who on this occasion appeared for the first time in England. Among the brilliant audience which crowded the hall were, of course, many whose visits to Bayreuth and Munich had made them acquainted with Herr Levi's remarkable gifts as an orchestral interpreter; but even these were scarcely prepared for such results as were achieved on the evening in question. The entente between Conductor and orchestra could not have been more perfect had months been devoted to rehearsal. The orchestra, it is true, was an exceptionally fine one—and large to match; but the instantaneous—we had almost said electric—way in which it carried out the multitude of effects indicated by Herr Levi gave convincing proof of the man's compelling power. The programme contained nothing new; we had the "Huldigungs Marsch," the "Siegfried Idyll," the Prelude to "Parsifal," the "Tannhäuser" Overture, and Beethoven's Seventh Symphony. Herr Levi's "readings" of these now familiar works approach, on the one side, those of Herr Richter in breadth of effect, dramatic insight, and dignity; and, on the other, those of Herr Mottl in clearness and particularisation of detail. His interpretation of Beethoven's Symphony was remarkable in both respects. More points were made, however, than we ever remember to have heard before, and though the result was undeniably interesting we are not quite sure that it would have obtained the composer's approbation. There is a tendency now-a-days to try and get more out of works than they actually contain, and while cheerfully asserting our preference for this method to the contrary plan of leaving much unexpressed that is there, it is only right to recognise that the better method has its dangers. At this Concert

Fräulein Ternina, of the Munich Opera, made a highly favourable impression by reason of her noble voice and powerful dramatic style. She was, however, far more successful in Elizabeth's Greeting from "Tannhäuser" than in the great "Invocation to Hope" from "Fidelio."

The Concert of the 22nd ult. was directed by Herr Mottl, and consisted of the second act of the "Flying Dutchman" and the first part of the third act of "Die Götterdämmerung." The artists who interpreted the solo parts in these works were Misses Ella Russell (Senta), Agnes Janson (Elber and Ralph); Messrs. Bispham, Andrew Black, Emil Gerhäuser, A. Barlow, and Lloyd Chandos. There was an efficient choir of ladies, which had been trained by Mr. H. J. Wood, and which Mr. Schultz-Curtius had imaginatively entitled "The Wagner Choir" (!), and the performance generally was good. It had, however, nothing about it distinctive enough to need particularisation.

ROYAL ARTILLERY BAND CONCERT.

THE fine band conducted by Cavaliere L. Zaverlat at Queen's Hall, on April 26, gave one of the most finished performances of Raff's "Lenore" Symphony yet heard in this country. Nothing that could add to the romanticism and weirdness of this strange but powerful work was wanting. The first section, illustrating the happiness of the lovers, was played with the requisite sentiment; the tuneful march was given with a spirit and precision that quickened the pulse of the audience; and there was no lack of vigour in the musical realisation of the grim terrors accompanying the nocturnal ride of the heroine and her ghostly companion. The Conductor was warmly complimented on the excellent rendering of the work he had secured. The second part of the Concert was more cheerful in tone. It had an interesting commencement in three excerpts from Mancinelli's incidental music to "Cleopatra," the smoothly written Barcarolle (placed between the Triumphal March and the Overture) being received with special approval. Loeschhorn's "Abendruhe," for strings, was tastefully played, as also was "Solvejg's Lied," from the second of Grieg's "Peer Gynt" Suites, and the spirit of Liszt's second Hungarian Rhapsody was satisfactorily caught. The Overture to "Tannhäuser," which closed the Concert, was among the best performances of the afternoon, and conclusively manifested the rare degree of efficiency at which the Royal Artillery Band has arrived.

AMATEUR ORCHESTRAL CONCERTS.

THE associations which give instrumental Concerts for art, and not for profit, continue to flourish, and several performances of this nature have been given during the last few weeks. The first we have to notice at present is that of the Stock Exchange Orchestral Society, at the Queen's Hall, on April 29. That promising composer, Mr. J. Moir Clarke, was represented by a new "Scotch" Suite, in four movements, in which we noted quite as much freshness and excellent musicianship as in the quintet which created such a favourable impression at the Popular Concerts a few weeks previously. Gade's genial Symphony in B flat (No. 4), Brahms's equally cheerful "Academic" Overture, and Mr. Edward German's delightful Dances, from his music to "Henry VIII.," were also well performed by Mr. George Kitchen's able forces, the programme being generally of an inspiring nature.

The Royal Amateur Orchestral Society will shortly complete the first quarter of a century of its existence, and the third Concert of the present season was given in the Queen's Hall, on Saturday, the 4th ult., under the direction of Mr. George Mount. By desire, Dvůrák's fresh and piquant Symphony in E minor, "From the New World," was repeated, and received a large measure of justice. Mendelssohn's "Melusina" Overture and Beethoven's "Lenore" (No. 3) were among the other orchestral pieces. Marked ability as a pianist was displayed by Miss Eleanor Davis, the Society's pianoforte scholar at the Royal College of Music, in Chopin's familiar Andante Spianato in G and Polonaise in E flat, and satisfaction was afforded by the vocal efforts of Madame Emily Squire (in place of Miss Esther Palliser) and Mr. Henry Piercy.

FESTIVAL OF THE SONS OF THE CLERGY.

THE 24th Festival of this Corporation was held in St. Paul's Cathedral, on the 15th ult. The musical portion of the proceedings claimed more than ordinary notice from the fact that it included an anthem, specially composed for the occasion by Dr. George J. Bennett, who took for his subject "On the Morn of Easter Day," the adaptation by the Rev. J. M. Neale of the "Mene Prima Sabbati." The music is not only extremely telling in itself, but thoroughly appropriate to the words. The chorus parts are bold and vigorous, there are solo passages for tenor and treble—those for the latter, beginning "Lips deploring, heart adoring," being eminently melodious and devotional—and a well-constructed fugue brings the whole to an imposing termination. The work was ably rendered by the choir of 200, conducted by Dr. Martin. Sir A. Sullivan's noble "In Memoriam" Overture was played by a band, numbering nearly fifty, as a voluntary, the organ (Mr. Hodge) taking part in the final movement. The Service was that in C, by Mr. Henry Gadsby; the "Old Hundredth" was sung before the sermon (preached by Canon Ainger, Master of the Temple), and the "Hallelujah" chorus, as for upwards of a century, just preceded the Benediction.

HIGHBURY PHILHARMONIC SOCIETY.

NEARLY twenty years have elapsed since the defunct Sacred Harmonic Society produced Rossini's semi-sacred opera, "Moses in Egypt," as an oratorio, under the late Sir Michael Costa, and the work has been given frequently since, though it can scarcely be said to have become really popular. The excellent association in the North of London, over which Mr. G. H. Betjemann presides so ably, added "Moses in Egypt" to its repertory at the last Concert of the season, on the 7th ult., and secured a fine performance, though abbreviations were made in the score in addition to those of Costa, in order to accommodate visitors from a distance. Some changes had to be made at short notice in the extensive list of principal vocalists, but Miss Thudichum and Miss Rose Dafforne were excellent substitutes for Miss Fillinger and Miss Elliott, who were unable to fulfil their engagements. Miss Florence Monk, Mr. Edward Lloyd, Mr. Charles Chiley, Mr. Harrison Brockbank, and Mr. Bantock Pierpoint did well in their respective parts, and the orchestra and choir, the former largely and the latter wholly composed of amateurs, acquitted themselves to the entire satisfaction of all concerned.

THE MISSES EISSLER'S CONCERT.

THESE young ladies (respectively violinist and harpist to the Duke of Saxe-Coburg and Gotha) gave an Orchestral Concert on the afternoon of the 11th ult., at Queen's Hall. The programme, though rather too long, was more than usually attractive. The two most important works were Beethoven's Violin Concerto and Sir A. C. Mackenzie's beautiful "Pibroch," in both of which Miss Marianne Eissler exhibited her skill and talent to very great advantage. The task involved in a rendering at all satisfactory of these works is, as everyone knows, so formidable that it might have been thought sufficient for one afternoon; but Miss Eissler added to it by playing Wieniawski's "Airs Russes." The pieces selected by Miss Clara Eissler—who is one of the best harpists of our day—were a melodious but rococo Concertino by Parish Alvars; a very charming Fantasia by Saint-Saëns; and a Legende by Thomé, which had not previously been heard in England. This is rather an orchestral piece with harp obligato than a work for harp with orchestral accompaniment. The orchestration is charming, full of delicate and poetical effects, and, to the imaginative hearer with curiosity stimulated by the title "Legende," rich in suggestion. This piece should be heard again at an early date. The orchestra, an excellent one, led by Mr. G. H.

Betjemann, did full justice to the important work that fell to its share, which included the Overtures to Weber's "Euryanthe" and Auber's "La Sirène." Sir A. C. Mackenzie conducted his own "Pibroch," but during the rest of the Concert the bâton was wielded by Mr. F. H. Cowen, who, of course, figured in the programme as the official conductor of the Concert.

ROYAL ACADEMY OF MUSIC.—LECTURES.

THE discourses at the Royal Academy of Music were resumed on the 8th ult., when Mr. F. Corder began a series of Lectures upon Composition. The lecturer's remarks were of an eminently practical nature, and directed to dispel confused and irrational ideas concerning musical creation. Conception was shown to be the natural outcome of the working of the brain, much of which took place automatically. Examples of this unconscious action were given, and the common saying, "I will think the matter over," was quoted as a recognition of the time required by the brain for the assimilation and development of ideas. What was called inspiration was not a "lighting down from above," but merely the result of a complicated course of mental evolution, much of which took place unconsciously. The simultaneous playing of several games of chess was by many people regarded as marvellous, but it was not such a proof of the perfect automatic action of the brain as afforded by a highly trained pianist when playing rapidly an elaborate piece. In the latter case probably some six or seven hundred notes per minute would be struck with varying force and accentuation, while, perchance, the mind of the executant was thinking of something else. When the brain had evolved a musical phrase, it was immediately submitted by the experienced composer to an examination as to its fitness and capabilities, and was accepted or rejected accordingly. This examination might be conscious or unconscious. Some brains naturally worked quicker than others. Mozart's worked with an abnormal rapidity that confounded the ordinary mind. Four things were necessary to the composer: 1. An intense love of the Art; 2. A reasonably perfect ear; 3. Intimate acquaintance with compositions of the past, and especially with those of the present age; 4. Practice. To disprove the common assertion that "some had the gift of composition and others not, and that was all about it," the lecturer read extracts from Edgar Poe's "Essay on the Philosophy of Composition," in which the author minutely describes the process by which he wrote his famous poem "The Raven." Why young musicians so often "got stuck" was because they did not know exactly what they wanted to say, and because when they had anything to say they did not know how to say it. The process was exactly reflected in the school-boy's letter. It was not inspiration that hindered students from mastering the intricacies of harmony, but want of knowledge. How could they hope to equal or surpass a composition which they could not correctly analyse? Music was divisible into three great divisions: 1. The song or dance; 2. Constructive movements; 3. The dramatic piece. The first was complete in certain little blocks, all more or less conclusive in themselves. In the second the divisions were not so clearly defined, the endeavour being to hide the effect of the joints. Only the cultivated musician could understand dramatic music. This seemed to have no perceptible form, but to depend upon something else. At the present time it endeavoured to be vague, and was, in short, purposely elusive. Those who understood it could appreciate the many ingenious devices which were employed to avoid a full close, or anything which was in opposition to the continuity of thought. The lecturer concluded by playing and analysing the construction of examples of these three divisions of music.

At the second Lecture, on the following Wednesday, Mr. Corder combated the commonly held ideas on inspiration concerning tune. Every melody, he said, could be traced to others which had preceded it. The tune of our National Anthem was traced to an old Scotch carol, "Remember, O man," and farther back still in a song attributed to Henry VIII., entitled "My little pretty one." National and folk-tunes were not invented, they grew, just like other natural products. Scientifically, nothing was created, only re-arranged; but each composer thought he had "invented" his melodies. The earliest development in tune was to write a second part; afterwards to repeat the first after the second. This was not due to inspiration, but to the sense of symmetry. This was the form of the popular song and dance to-day. As soon, however, as the simplicity of this arrangement was departed from, the music appealed to a rapidly decreasing audience. Examples of this form in its simple and elaborated conditions could be seen in Friar Tuck's song and the preceding song of the King in Sir Arthur Sullivan's opera "Ivanhoe." The mere succeeding one melody by another did not make an art work any more than did the pasting a number of pictures in an album. The composer must weld together portions of tunes. The result was beyond the comprehension of the unlearned, but they might be stirred to a vague admiration, in much the same way as they might be acted upon by the expression and gestures of the actors at a French play. The lecturer then briefly sketched the different forms of musical expression which had succeeded each other since the time of the Netherlands school, and said that the manner in which one age of music begat the next was a beautiful study. In conclusion, he assured his listeners that experienced composers did not sit down to the pianoforte, and with upcast eyes take their chance of being delivered of a symphony or a barn dance, but set about their work in a most methodical manner.

The third discourse was chiefly devoted to the important subject of musical rhythm. To define rhythm, the lecturer said, was difficult, because it had many aspects, but a good mental picture was suggested by the various patterns of wall papers, which might be taken as representative of musical designs. The recurrences of a small pattern were a source of weakness in music. The adoption of a large pattern produced broad effects. English music was particularly weak in variety of rhythm, probably the result of the sameness of accents in our language. With one exception the tingling sense of rhythm which seemed to be in the Bohemian blood was looked for in vain in modern idols, that exception was Dvořák. Illustrations were most effectively played by Miss Sybil Palliser.

GUILDHALL SCHOOL OF MUSIC.

If the term may be pardoned, the musical academy on the Victoria Embankment is a "go-ahead" institution. On the 3rd ult. a performance was sanctioned by the Principal of no less exacting a work than Gounod's tragic opera "Romeo and Juliet," at Drury Lane Theatre. The choice for students, however promising, cannot be commended; but, at the same time, some of the young people who took part in the representation merit warm words of encouragement. The Romeo of Mr. Lloyd Chandos showed intelligence and general musical taste, and Miss Jessie Hudleston was sweet and winning as Juliet. Next to these must be placed Mr. Griffiths Percy, as Friar Lawrence, and Mr. Charles Hinchcliff. The performance was conducted with the utmost zeal and assiduity by Sir Joseph Barnby, and praise is due to Mr. Neill O'Donovan, the chorusmaster, and Mr. Wilfrid Esmond, the stage manager, for their painstaking efforts in the preparation of the performance; but we would suggest the selection of a less exacting opera for the next public appearance of the Guildhall Operatic Students.

VARIOUS RECITALS.

THE term "Recital" seems to be regarded by many worthy musicians as more attractive than "Concert" at the present time, though in many instances it is scarcely applicable. However, it may be allowed with reference to the entertainment offered by Madame Frickenhaus at St. James's Hall, on the 2nd ult., as concerted music was not in evidence. The able pianist gave Weber's fine Sonata in D (No. 3), a work by no means too frequently heard, and smaller pieces by Mendelssohn, Chopin, Dvořák, Richard Strauss, and Smetana.

Baré record will suffice concerning the second of Mrs. Hutchinson and Madame Haas, in the Queen's (Small) Hall, on the 3rd ult. These agreeable artists should resume their performances at a less busy period of the year, when they would obtain more attention.

Miss Margaret Carter, an excellent pianist and evidently a well-cultured musician, has been giving a series of four Pianoforte Recitals for children in the Queen's (Small) Hall, the first of which took place on Saturday, the 4th ult. Previous to playing the various pieces in the programmes, she explained them by word of mouth in well chosen words, and in their execution displayed admirable taste and fine technique.

M. Léon Delafosse, who gave the first of two Pianoforte Recitals at St. James's Hall, on the 10th ult., must unfortunately be numbered among those performers who are more pretentious than pleasing. In Beethoven's Sonatas in C (Op. 2, No. 3) and in E flat (No. 7) he displayed more energy than refinement; but he was more acceptable in some of the subsequent compositions by Weber, Chopin, Schumann, Liszt, and Rubinstein.

Words of encouragement should be bestowed on Miss Annie Burghes, who gave a Pianoforte Recital, on the 14th ult., at St. James's Hall. She is an executant of considerable intelligence, and rendered a good account of herself in Beethoven's "Waldstein" in C (Op. 53), Mendelssohn's Prelude and Fugue in E minor (No. 1), and various pieces by Schumann, Chopin, Grieg, Scarlatti, Mendelssohn, Liszt, and other masters.

Dr. Otto Neitzel has stuck bravely to his task of giving a series of Pianoforte Recitals at the Steinway Hall, and has displayed much sound technique, if but only a moderate amount of inspiration, in various works by Beethoven, Mendelssohn, Schumann, Schubert, Liszt, and other composers. Details are not required, but it may be stated that one of the pieces included in Dr. Neitzel's programmes was Beethoven's truly great Sonata in B flat (Op. 106), which is seldom heard on account of its extreme length and exceptional difficulty.

That extraordinary violinist, Mr. Willy Burmester, has given an Orchestral Concert and three Recitals, at St. James's Hall, during the past month. The Concert took place on the 6th ult., and the programme included Spohr's Concerto in E minor (No. 7), in which he played like an artist, and pieces by Saint-Saëns, Wieniawski, and Paganini, in which his truly marvellous "virtuosity," as it is termed, was evinced in the strongest possible manner. At the first Recital, on the afternoon of the 15th ult., Mr. Burmester's most important effort was Mendelssohn's Concerto, which he played with the composer's own accompaniment, taking the last movement with lightning rapidity.

Among the many Pianoforte Recitals during the past month not the least successful have been the three given by Miss Mathilde Verne in the Queen's (Small) Hall. The young lady, who was formerly known as Miss Mathilde Wurm, has much improved since she first came to England, and played a variety of selections in which the old masters, especially Bach, were strongly represented. One interesting piece was the Leipzig composer's fine, but rarely heard, Concerto in C minor for two pianofortes, in which the Recital-giver was associated with Miss Fanny Davies. Vocalists took part in the programmes, so that the entertainments partook of the nature of Chamber Concerts.

GRESHAM LECTURES.

THE recent series of Gresham Lectures begun on the 20th ult., at the City of London School, will probably be the most memorable that Professor Bridge has delivered. At the first the lecturer resumed his instructive relation of the development of the string quartet, carrying the history of this musical form through the time of Haydn and Mozart down to the advent of Beethoven. The Professor showed that before Haydn's time composers had chiefly confined their efforts in this direction to writing for three-stringed instruments with a figured bass. This lasted for nearly a hundred years, down to about 1750. Haydn's quartets for four-stringed instruments marked a new development. Mozart, at once the pupil and teacher of Haydn, died eighteen years before Haydn, and the best quartets of the latter were written during this period. Excerpts from the quartets of each of the three great composers referred to were admirably played by Miss Lillian Wright, Mr. Hopkinson, Mr. Hobday, and Mr. Werge, under the direction of Mr. Borland.

At the second Lecture, on the following day, the original version of Purcell's setting of the Te Deum in D was performed, under the direction of Sir Joseph Barnby, by a chorus and orchestra from the Guildhall School of Music, with Professor Bridge at a vocalion, kindly lent by Mr. Baillie Hamilton. The original edition, published by Mrs. Purcell in 1697, which agrees with the recently discovered autograph score, consists of 328 bars, while Boyce's edition, as published in 1829, has 477 bars, 149 bars thus being added. The nature of Boyce's editing was as follows:—

ORIGINAL EDITION.

No real break in continuity, and could, at most, only be made to consist of ten numbers.

"Heaven and earth." Word "heaven," altos and tenors in thirds; words "and earth" for basses.

"All the earth." All voices in turn, beginning with basses, take up notes of chord of D through two octaves and then all voices and trumpets burst in with full chord.

"After 'Father everlasting,'" no break.

"The glorious company." Complete string accompaniment, containing an effective figure.

Between each of three sentences, "The glorious company," "The goodly fellowship," and "The noble army," two striking chords only.

"The Father of an infinite." No introductory symphony voices with organ, and as contrast two little ritornelli for strings.

"Also the Holy Ghost."

"Thou art the King." Written in D major.

{ Duet—
"When Thou tookest."

{ "Thou didst open the kingdom."

"Thou sittest." No symphony.

"We believe" (containing thirty-four chords).

"Day by day."

"We magnify Thee."

"Vouchsafe." Alto, D minor, forty-five bars in length.

"O Lord, in Thee." All voices start together.

BOYCE'S EDITION.

Fifteen numbers; most involving change in tempo, and beginning or ending with long-winded symphonies.

Two trebles added an octave higher, screaming up to A in alt. Bar added as kind of echo by the trumpets. After words "and earth," bar added consisting of repetition of the two notes for tympani.

Piling up of chord got rid of. In its place a passage for tenors and basses in unison. Echoed by same passage for altos and sopranos, partly in unison and breaking into an octave.

"Father everlasting," followed by symphony in fugal style; poor in idea and poorly treated.

Some notes of solo changed and string part altered, in one place put a fourth lower and key changed.

Between each sentence two extra bars of weak fiddle passages.

Starts with introduction, one bar of first and whole of second ritornello cut out; five bars added.

Harmony of first two bars altered, second alto allotted to tenor; who has to bawl out a top A and two G's.

One bar turned into D major, and an accidental taken out of trumpet part, altering the subject.

Shockingly mutilated; bass changed in six places; symphony of two bars introduced.

Faster tempo and point of imitation re-written.

Bass enters two beats later than it should, and point made commonplace by omitting some accidentals and adding others; duet spoiled by having a chorus made out of the second part of it.

Introduced and ended by symphony.

Introductory and concluding symphonies added. Eighteen chords out of thirty-four altered and spoiled. Augmented sixth and other chromatic chords expunged.

Mutilated; trumpets marking first and third beats struck out; vocal parts altered, two bars of symphony introduced.

Trumpet effect coming in between voices spoiled by addition of A in alto part; rhythm of bar changed for a time.

Tenor, B minor; fourteen bars greatly altered out of forty-five.

Starts off with altos.

It is not too much to say that Purcell's original setting is a revelation, and a striking witness to the genius of our great composer. The work is dignified in conception, terse, impressive, and wonderfully modern in expression; this last attribute being most notable in the solo parts, which were effectively sung by Miss Oliver and Mr. Dan Price. Listening to the solo "Vouchsafe, O Lord," with its Bach-like depth of expression, it is somewhat difficult to think it was written at a time when Bach and Handel were but ten years old. "I was never more astonished," said the lecturer, "than when I began to examine Purcell in autograph and compare with Purcell in print, as known to me and to other musicians in the Novello edition of 1829, with Dr. Boyce's additions." Concerning the acquisition of the autograph MS., the Professor said: "One day, coming out of Westminster Abbey, a figure appeared in the cloisters, and asked me if I had a moment to spare. I answered 'No; I am very busy.' He replied he was sorry, as he had a MS. which he thought was Purcell's. 'Come in to tea at once,' I answered." When the mysterious stranger left he was minus the MS. There would seem to be no doubt about the authenticity of the MS., which was exhibited, together with the first printed edition, which contains twenty-three errors and slight variations from the MS. The title runs: "A Te Deum and Jubilate for Voices and Instruments, made for St. Cecilia's Day, 1694." Purcell had, it appeared, written three odes for the celebration of St. Cecilia's Day, 1683, and although this day had been previously celebrated by musicians, this was really the beginning of our musical festivals. The Professor thought that Boyce's alterations had been dictated by a desire to make Purcell's work as much as possible like Handel's "Dettingen Te Deum," which had replaced the former in popularity. Purcell's setting was revived in 1829 at the annual Festival of the Sons of the Clergy in St. Paul's Cathedral, but Boyce's unwarrantable alterations had led to the work's extinction. It should be added that the original version is now published by Messrs. Novello, and as it takes only a quarter-of-an-hour in performance it should take a prominent place in our church festival services, for a Te Deum out of the ordinary Cathedral type, suitable for special services, not too long and not too difficult, is a real want. Purcell's setting supplies this want to perfection.

"Samuel Pepys and Music" was the subject of the third Lecture, delivered on the 22nd ult., and very entertaining did the discourse prove. Pepys was an enthusiastic lover of music, a performer and a composer, and his entries concerning the art threw a valuable light on the state of music and personalities of musicians of his period. He had the members of his household taught music, and tried to instruct his wife himself, although apparently with but little success, as on one occasion, when he had tried to teach his wife to sing, he wrote: "Poor wretch! her ear is so bad, and it did make me so angry that the poor wretch cried." He went to the Parish Church at Westminster, "and there did entertain myself with a perspective glass up and down the church, and between that and sleeping passed the time till sermon was done." St. Paul's Cathedral Choir is described "as the worst he had ever heard," and of Westminster Abbey he says, "they read the service in a ridiculous manner"; but he was better pleased at Windsor, where, however, some fuss would seem to have been made over him. At the theatre, on one occasion, he was so delighted with the "wind music," that he says "it was so sweet it ravished me, and, indeed, did make me sick, just as formerly when in love with my wife." Several most interesting songs, including one by Pepys, entitled "Beauty, retire," which proved dignified and declamatory in character, were excellently sung by Mr. Dan Price and one of the Westminster choirboys.

MUSICAL ASSOCIATION.

Mr. W. H. GILL's paper on "Manx Music," read at the May meeting of the Musical Association, proved to be more of a popular than a scientific nature. Manx music may present "a new field for inquiry," but it is questionable if examination would reveal any characteristics apart from those common to Irish and Scotch folk-tunes. Mr. Gill brought forward an interesting collection of Manx songs, but none of them possessed distinction to students of early folk-music. A few contained the so-called Scotch snap, which, however, is common to all music of Celtic origin; but the majority of the specimens were of Irish character. Mr. Gill has been collecting from the lips of old Manx song-men the ancient folk-tunes, with the view of their preservation in printed form; but it is to be hoped that he will take the words of Mr. Banister, who presided, to heart, and refrain from fitting them with modern harmonies and altering their form by adding bars where the rhythm to him seems incomplete, as he admitted having done in one instance. Such a procedure would make the collection utterly valueless. The songs were effectively sung by Miss Dora Gill, and other examples were played by Miss M. S. Hemming, Miss M. B. Theobald, Miss G. M. Smith, and Mr. J. Finn.

THE "WAKEFIELD" MUSIC COMPETITIONS AT KENDAL.

If growth be a sign of vigorous life, the annual Music Competitions held in Westmorland must be regarded as an institution enjoying robust health. Ever since the unpretending quartet competition, held at a small village near Kendal in 1885, which was the fons et origo of the institution, its growth has been uninterrupted. At this year's Festival, which began on April 23, no fewer than 1,030 individual competitors entered for the various prizes, the largest number yet recorded; and, for the first time, three days were taken up by the event. The value of these competitions as a means of improving the musical taste and musical proficiency of the district is not easily over-estimated. It has been demonstrated very satisfactorily by the steady heightening of the standard of performance. This year there was an obvious all-round improvement in general artistic perception, in an appreciation of the æsthetic and emotional qualities of the music performed, that was a very encouraging sign. But perhaps the most striking proof of the good work that has been accomplished lies in the fact that, from a county sparsely populated and by no means musical in its traditions, it is now found possible to form a first-rate chorus of four hundred voices, capable of singing unhackneyed and difficult music with precision, power, and intelligence. This has been accomplished chiefly, if not entirely, through the exertions of one lady, Miss Wakefield; and, though it may be difficult to find many musicians equally able, indefatigable, and judicious, her example might well be followed in other districts. It is hard to point to any part of the competitions that is not of distinct value to the cause of art. The soloists' competitions are certainly of less obvious importance than the choral competitions; but even they have this advantage—they introduce to the competitors, and through them to many others, a very different style of song from those to which they are accustomed. On the present occasion eleven sopranos appeared to attempt Schubert's "Hark, hark, the lark"; five contraltos sang Handel's "What tho' I trace"; twelve tenors struggled valiantly with the difficulties of Purcell's "I attempt from Love's sickness to fly"; and eight basses were heard in "Now heaven in fullest glory shone." The majority of these aspirants came from the villages and market towns of Westmorland, the larger towns, such as Lancaster, for instance, being carefully excluded from the purview of the prospectus. Though some of the singers may be said to have allowed their ambition to override their discretion, the average level attained was a high one, and in refinement and intelligence distinctly higher than in former years. Most of the soloists took part afterwards in the choral competitions and in the choral portions of the Festival Concert, and it can be easily understood how much these gained by their co-operation. Combined with these solos were the instrumental competitions. There were only two entries for the String Quartet Prize, a falling off from former years that may be partially accounted for by the introduction of a new competition, for Pianoforte Trio, for which there were five entries. The test pieces, in each case from Haydn, were not quite happily chosen, a fact which may also have had something to do with the less satisfactory results. But the real reason is that in England instrumental music is more of an exotic than it was in the time of "Good Queen Bess," or even later days. The first and last were the chief days of the Festival. The first was the day of the children—the musicians of the future. Its most remarkable feature was the excellence of the sight singing. The accuracy with which some of the children sang the very difficult tests set them was indeed wonderful, and it is noteworthy that a much higher standard was reached than by the adults in a similar competition. An excellent performance of Mr. Roeckel's very tuneful cantata "The Silver Penny," at a children's Concert, ended the day's proceedings. A pleasant and appropriate feature of this Concert was the singing of several pieces from Humperdinck's fairy opera "Hänsel und Gretel," by the Countess Valda Gleichen and Miss Wakefield. The third and last day was the busiest and most important, the liveliest interest and keenest emulation being excited by the adult choral competitions. Among the more noteworthy features of the proceedings were the unusually good singing of the male-voice choirs in Este's "How merrily we live," and the decided all-round improvement noticeable in the madrigal competition of eight choirs that sang Wilbye's "Adieu, sweet Amaryllis." The winners obtained fifty-four marks out of a possible sixty, while the least successful competitors obtained forty-six. In the class for "Village Choral Societies or Choirs" each choir had, in addition to the set piece, to undergo a sight reading test, an excellent method of ensuring that their success was obtained not by mere "cram," but by musicianship. The judges were the same as at last year's competitions—Messrs. McNaught, Arthur Somervell, and Luard Selby, whose decisions were the more valuable to the competitors since they invariably gave the reasons on which their judgments were based, accompanied by many useful hints. The Festival ended in the accustomed manner with a Concert, in which all the competing choirs, to the number of some 400 voices, took part. It was a more brilliant success than usual, owing to the interesting work that formed the chief part of the programme, and had been written specially for the occasion by Mr. Arthur Somervell. His cantata, "The power of sound," is based on Wordsworth's poem, and is written for a soloist—on this occasion Madame Clara Samuël—chorus, and orchestra. Its form and scope may be most readily described by a reference to Dr. Parry's "St. Cecilia" Ode. The influence of the same composer is felt also in matters of style and points of detail; but, in addition, there is a feeling for sensuous beauty of sound that is quite Mr. Somervell's own. In setting a poem that deals with the sounds of nature the temptation to be imitative, or at least descriptive, must be strong; and it is to Mr. Somervell's credit that he has never transgressed Beethoven's well-known canon, save, perhaps, in a passage where the cuckoo's note is happily made use of in the chorus parts. But he has Beethoven's example for this, if not his precept. A vigorous chorus, "The Pipe of Pan," is likely to prove very popular, as it deserves to be, and the solos are charming for their refinement and delicate finish; the orchestration is full of interest, though it was deprived of some of its effect by the absence of some necessary instruments. Miss Wakefield conducted an admirable performance, and Mr. Somervell had every reason to be satisfied with both the performance and the reception of his work. Between the parts of the cantata the prizes were given away by the Duke of Westminster, whose practical interest in the event has been shown by similar competitions instituted by him on his estates.

THE Saxe-Coburg company will open on the 17th inst., at Drury Lane, when "Der Vogelhändler," a comic opera, will be given for the first time in London. The répertoire will include "Der Waffenschmidt," "Hänsel und Gretel," "Der Bettel-Student," "Die Fledermaus," "Die Zigeuner-Baron," "Die verkaufte Braut," and "Czaar und Zimmermann."

REVIEWS.

An Order of Service for Children. Compiled by the Rev. and Hon. Canon Bouverie. The music edited by the Countess of Radnor. [Novello, Ewer and Co.]

THIS compilation, which is published in several forms to meet various requirements, may be recommended to those who conduct children's services. A special and very useful feature of the volume is twenty-eight metrical litanies, embracing all the chief church Festivals and celebrations. A considerable portion of the music provided for these litanies is contributed by widely esteemed composers, and is well suited in style and compass to children's voices. The second part of the volume under notice consists of a shortened form of the church service for special occasions, and includes a selection of appropriate Psalms and hymns with accompanying chants and tunes. The latter appear to have been chosen chiefly with regard to their popularity and melodious attractiveness. Several of our finest modern hymns will be found in this collection, and also some to the editor, notably amongst the latter a spirited setting of "Soldiers of the Cross, arise!" The directions for certain lines to be sung in unison, by treble or men's voices, are to be heartily welcomed as a recognition of the requirements and abilities of present congregations, and the value of the book is much increased by the addition of Sir Herbert Oakeley's double quartet, "Evening and Morning," and Professor Bridge's impressive setting of Tennyson's "Crossing the Bar."

Novello's Music Primers and Educational Series. Edited by Sir John Stainer and Dr. C. Hubert H. Parry. The Pianist's Dictionary. By Ernest Pauer. [Novello, Ewer and Co.]

"Of all musical instruments, the pianoforte is decidedly the most popular, and, with but few exceptions, every composer of instrumental music has written longer or shorter works for it." Thus writes the author in his preface, and he might have added that every musician plays it more or less well. Mr. Pauer's little work appeals, therefore, to a large class. With regard to the line drawn by him between names which should be mentioned and those which should be omitted, we see no ground whatever for complaint. To become acquainted with the names of musicians and teachers who have not published any music is, as the author remarks, "exceedingly difficult." The Dictionary is not merely a record of names, facts, works, and dates; it contains, also, interesting remarks respecting the characteristic features of the pianoforte music of the most eminent composers, together with complete lists of their pianoforte works, and, in some cases, rather sharp criticisms of smaller men.

Every attempt has been made to bring the volume quite up to date. Mr. Leonard Borwick, one of the most promising pianists of the day, appears, probably, for the first time in a dictionary; his first appearance in London was in 1890. Among entries of quite recent events, we note that of the death of the great Russian pianist, Anton Rubinstein. Of modern Russian pianoforte music, by the way, we hear little at concerts, and when a Russian name—usually a long one—appears on a programme, it carries with it few, if any, associations. Mr. Pauer is, we believe, the first to give the names of Anatole Liadow, Anton Stepanowitsch Arensky, and Sergei Wassiliewitch Rachmaninoff. A * is prefixed to all these names, and wherever such a mark occurs it indicates personal information obtained by Mr. Pauer. It is curious to observe how little seems to be known about the lives of some of the early French clavecinists. For instance, of Chambonnières, only the approximate date of birth or death can be given; of Anglebert, no information seems forthcoming. We notice that Mr. Pauer does not mention Beethoven's Sonata in C minor (Op. 11) among the works which that master dedicated to the Archduke Rudolf. He was, however, justified in omitting it, for the Archduke's name does not appear on the autograph in the possession of Messrs. Artaria and Co. But in a letter, written to the Archduke in 1823, Beethoven says: "As your Royal Highness seemed to be pleased with the Sonata in C minor, I thought it would not appear too bold to surprise you with the dedication of it." Mention of Beethoven recalls another reference in this book to one of his later sonatas. Under the name of Miss Arabella Goddard we are told that she was the first pianist to introduce the Sonata in B flat (Op. 106) to the London public. It is, however, said that M. Alexandre Billet was the first to undertake this herculean task. Under Purcell we find named "Ten Sonatas for the Harpsichord," published in 1683. It is difficult to account for this entry in a Dictionary so carefully compiled. The harpsichord plays only a subordinate part in Purcell's twelve sonatas in three parts, published in 1683. We notice that the young composer-pianist, Otto Hegner, has desired that no mention be made of his compositions. Such modesty is, indeed, rare. The volume concludes with a useful list of pianoforte makers, and detailed accounts respecting instruments, prizes, firms, &c. We ought to have mentioned that Mr. Pauer, in the various lists of compositions, has placed a mark against certain pieces to which the composers have specially called his attention, or which he, with his experience, has deemed specially worthy of notice. For this teachers will thank him. To select suitable pieces is always more or less tedious, and, to those of little experience, a difficult task.

Deux Orientales (No. 1, Romance; No. 2, Caprice), Mazurka, Gondoliera, Berceuse, Scherzo. For Pianoforte solo. By Sig. Stojowski.

[Stanley Lucas, Weber, Pitt and Hatzfeld, Limited.]

NONE of these pieces are difficult or long; they require, however, a considerable amount of taste from the players who undertake to reveal their beauties, which, though not perhaps of the rarest order, are nevertheless many. Chief among their merits are a certain vein of originality—of quaintness, indeed, in the case of the two pieces first named—and a degree of refinement and grace that is very welcome. The Scherzo is mostly written in canon, and, though the chief theme is, to our thinking, too constantly present, is very pretty. The "Oriental" Romance is perhaps the most striking of the series. All these pieces may be recommended for teaching purposes—that is, if the pupil has musical feeling and a good instrument by which to reveal it. Otherwise Clementi will be safer.

Novello's Octavo Edition of Trios, Quartets, &c. For Female Voices. Nos. 302-304.

[Novello, Ewer and Co.]

THE first of these is "So the world goes round," words by V. E. A. C.; music in three parts by Marie Wurm (Op. 46). It is a very brief composition of three pages only, but piquant and tuneful, with an effective accompaniment. The next, "Softly the moonlight," words by Mrs. Hemans, music by F. Iliffe, is for four voices. It is a soft and somewhat plaintive serenade, and though a pianoforte part is thoughtfully provided, in case of need, the piece would be more effective if sung in a refined manner without accompaniment. Concerning the last, Mr. Walter Macfarren's "You stole my love," freely adapted for female voices in four parts by Frederick Maxson, it would be superfluous to say a word, except to commend the cleverness of the arrangement.

The Auld Scotch Songs and Ballads. Arranged and harmonised by Sinclair Dunn. (Second series.)

[Glasgow: Morison Bros.]

THIS is a cheap quarto volume, well printed on good paper, and containing ninety-six of the finest Scottish songs, with pianoforte accompaniments, historical notes, and hints regarding expression, &c. Some of the songs are given with the accompaniments of Haydn and Beethoven, and a few are arranged as vocal quartets. Why, however, Haydn's "My mother bids me bind my hair" should be included in a collection entitled "The Auld Scotch Songs," because it was "a great favourite in Glasgow forty years ago," and the words were written by a Scotswoman, is not quite clear.

Trois Morceaux de Concert. Pour Violon avec Accompagnement de Piano. Par Charles Dancla.
[Paris: Richault et Cie.]

THE second and third of these pieces, respectively entitled "Le roi des Tzigans" and "L'Espoir," are good examples of this composer's style. Both are designedly written for effective display in the concert-room, and contain many passages which will give gratification to the brilliant executant, and, if justice is done them, to the listener. "Le roi des Tzigans" is appropriately variable in sentiment, and for the most part, of an energetic character. "L'Espoir" is of a kind that may be described as fervent in expression and that takes delight in the elaborate ornamentation of its subject.

Nature and Love. Cantata for Female Voices. Written and composed by P. Tschaiowsky. English translation by the Rev. J. Troutbeck, D.D. [Novello, Ewer and Co.]

LADIES' choirs are now very numerous, and a brief work by such a gifted composer as Tschaiowsky should be warmly welcomed. The present is in one extended movement for one contralto and two soprano soloists and three-part chorus, the subject being the contrast between the feverish joys of human passion and the peaceful delights of nature. The music alternates between the remote keys of G flat and D natural, but the time is six-eight throughout, and the general style flowing, elegant, and eminently vocal.

FOREIGN NOTES.

AMSTERDAM.—The season of the Netherlands Opera Company came to its conclusion last month with a series of performances of "Lohengrin" and "Fidelio." In the latter opera, M. Meschaert, a concert-singer of established reputation, made his début on the stage in the part of Rocco, and both vocally and histrionically achieved a brilliant success.

BALTIMORE.—The Peabody Institute celebrated, on April 5, the centenary of the birth of its founder, with the performance of a Requiem, specially written for the occasion by Asgar Hamerik. The chorus of some 360 voices rendered excellent service, under the direction of Dr. Otto Simon, the composer himself conducting the Peabody Orchestra. There was a large concourse of musicians and music-lovers from all parts of the States, by whom the new work was received with enthusiasm.

BARCELONA.—"Enrico Clifford," a grand opera based upon an incident in the Wars of the Roses, was successfully produced here, for the first time on any stage, on the 6th ult. The music is by Señor Albeniz, and the libretto by an Englishman, disguised under the name of "Mountjoy."

BERLIN.—A new two-act opera, or "musical play" (Musikalisches Schauspiel) as it is called, entitled "Der Evangelimann," was brought out, on the 4th ult., at the Royal Opera, where it met with a very favourable reception. The composer, Dr. Wilhelm Kienzl, has already attained some reputation as a musician in Germany, and he is also the author of the libretto. The work contains some interesting and picturesque situations, which have been interpreted musically with considerable skill, the strongest portion of the score being, it is said, its orchestration. The performance, under the direction of Dr. Muck (to whom the work is dedicated), was an excellent one, with Herren Sylva and Bulss in the principal parts.—In connection with the artist-jubilee of Dr. Joachim, a fund has been established for the purpose of rendering assistance to poor students at German State-subventioned Schools of Music, without reference as to age, sex, or religion. The grants are to be made either in money or by way of the gift of a musical instrument.

BERNBERG.—The tenth annual Musical Festival of the Duchy of Anhalt, held here on the 4th and 5th ult., has been in every way successful. The united choirs of Dessau, Zerbst, Köthen, and Bernburg rendered a good account of themselves in the performance of Tinel's remarkable Oratorio "Franziskus" and a setting of the 100th Psalm, for chorus, bass solo, and orchestra, by Aug. Klughardt. Herr Vogl, of Bayreuth fame, sang the tenor part in the oratorio with excellent effect. The two days' programme included the usual solo performances, the proceedings closing, as has now become an established custom at these Festivals, with the "Wachet auf," Hans Sachs's address, and the final chorus, from "Die Meistersinger." Herr Klughardt was the very able conductor.

BRUSSELS.—Madame Marie Sasse, the well-known prima donna, has taken up her residence here, where she intends carrying on her academy for preparing young vocalists for the lyrical stage, hitherto established in Paris. Madame Sasse is a Belgian by birth, and amongst her successful pupils may be mentioned Madame Rose Caron.

CARLSRUHE.—"Frühlingstraum" is the title of a new ballet which has just been brought out with considerable success at the Court Theatre. Both the scenario and the music are by a young composer, Herr Philipp Bade.—A new comic opera, "Donna Diana," by E. von Reznicek, a rising Austrian composer, was recently brought out here and very favourably received, under Herr Mottl's direction.

COPENHAGEN.—The celebration, on the 14th ult., of the ninetieth birthday of the Danish composer, Professor Hartmann, assumed the character of a national fête. In the evening there was a gala performance at the Royal Theatre of "Liden Kirsten," one of Hartmann's most popular operas. The nonagenarian composer is still full of vigour, and only recently completed the score of an important new work.

DARMSTADT.—An important event in matters musical here has been the recent first performance, at the Hof-Theater, of Capellmeister de Haan's opera "Die Inkasöhne," a work as felicitous in the choice and the elaboration of its subject as it is distinguished in the musical treatment thereof. Herr de Haan (who is his own librettist) appears to be a follower of Wagner, but employs the Leitmotiv sparingly; and while he has learnt much from the Bayreuth master in regard to his treatment of the orchestra, he possesses and asserts an individuality of his own. The performance was an excellent one, under the composer's direction, no expense having been spared in the mounting of the work, which was received with much enthusiasm. The German Emperor, who was present at a repetition of the performance, expressed his intention to have the new opera produced at the Royal Opera, in Berlin, at an early date.

DRESDEN.—An opera, "Attila," has just been performed at the Hof-Theater for the first time, and very favourably received. The composer is Herr A. Gunkel, first violinist in the Royal Orchestra.—A comic opera, "The Apothecary," written in 1768 by Joseph Haydn, but never publicly performed, is to be produced in the course of this month at the Court Theatre. A German version of the Italian libretto has been supplied by Dr. Hirschfeld, the Viennese musical historian.—It is stated that a dealer in autographs here has recently given the sum of five hundred pounds for the original score of Wagner's "Tannhäuser"; probably the highest price as yet realised by the manuscript of an opera.—At an Orchestral Concert given here last month, under the direction of Court-capellmeister Schuch, some excerpts from a new ballet by Herr Maurice Moszkowski obtained a first hearing—viz., a Sarabande, a Valse des Elfes, and a March, each of them being enthusiastically encored. The ballet, which is entitled "Lauerin" (the scenario by Herr Emil Taubert), has been accepted for performance at the Berlin Opera in the coming autumn.

EISENACH.—The Wagner-Museum, the transference of which from Vienna is already in progress, will be located in the house hitherto known as "Fritz Reuter Villa" in this town.

FRANKFORT-ON-MAINE.—Herr Humperdinck is stated to have nearly finished a third fairy opera, "Der Wolf und die Sieben Geiseln" (The Wolf and the Seven Kidnings), to which his sister, Frau Wette, has again furnished the libretto.

GENOA.—A characteristic letter by Verdi has been making the round of Italian journals lately. Replying to a request that he should undertake to set to music a hymn written by the poet Carducci, in celebration of the approaching twenty-fifth anniversary of the unification of Rome with the rest of Italy, the master, addressing General Menotti Garibaldi, as chairman of committee, under date Genoa, April 6, 1895, says: "I should not have been able, even in my younger days, to write music to any poetry, hymn, or other work, for any occasion whatsoever. I have never done it, with the solitary exception of a cantata, composed in 1861 or 1862, for an Exhibition held in London; and I made a mistake then. Now my pen has grown tired, and it would be impossible for me to write anything which would not be absolutely unworthy of such a grand solemnization and of the truly magnificent verses of Carducci. I therefore ask you, Signor Presidente, kindly to accept my excuses, and to believe me to remain, with perfect esteem, your devoted GIUSEPPE VERDI."

LIEGE.—A grand International Male Choir Competition is announced to take place here from the 21st to the 28th of next month, under the protectorate of the King of the Belgians.

MADRID.—Under the title of "El Vendedor de Pajaros," Carl Zeller's operetta "Der Vogelhändler" has just been brought out with great success at the Teatra de la Comedia. The appreciation of Wagner's music is making rapid strides here, as elsewhere in the peninsula. At a Wagner Concert recently given here, under the direction of the Maestro Campanini, excerpts from "Tristan and Isolde" and "Parsifal" were presented to a delighted audience, and commented on with intelligent approval in the press organs.

MANNHEIM.—Smetana's three-act opera "Dalibor," with the German adaptation of the libretto by Herr Kalbeck, well-mounted and with an efficient cast, has been received with marked favour at the Hof-Theater.

MILAN.—The second Concert of the season, given on the 5th ult., by the Società Orchestrale della Scala, presented a programme of a distinctly modern type, including Raff's Symphony, "In the Forest," excerpts from Wagner's "Tristan and Isolde," and Liszt's symphonic poem, "Hunnenschlacht."—There has been quite a little passage of arms lately between Messrs. Leoncavallo and Mascagni. It appears to have leaked out that the author of an anonymous article recently published in an Italian paper, charging the composer of "Cavalleria Rusticana" with quite a number of "appropriations" from other composers in his different operas, was no other than Signor Leoncavallo himself. Mascagni, thereupon, with caustic humour, retorted that he was at present laboriously engaged in compiling a little pamphlet of most moderate proportions, setting forth in detail the few numbers contained in Signor Leoncavallo's operas which had not been appropriated.

MUNICH.—The programme of the performances of the works of Richard Wagner (with the exception of "Die Nizze von Palermo" and of "Parsifal") to be given here in the autumn has been issued. The following operas are to be given twice, once in August and again on the corresponding date in September—viz., "Die Feen" on the 8th, "Rienzi" on the 9th, "Der Fliegende Holländer" on the 11th, "Tannhäuser" on the 13th, "Lohengrin" on the 15th, "Das Rheingold" on the 17th, "Die Walküre" on the 18th, "Siegfried" on the 20th, and "Götterdämmerung" on the 22nd; the last four belonging to "Der Ring des Nibelungen." "Tristan and Isolde" will be played on August 25 and 29 and September 25, and "Die Meistersinger" on August 27 and September 1 and 27. The music will be under the direction of Herren Hermann Levi, Franz Fischer, and Richard Strauss.

NAPLES.—In connection with the tercentenary celebrations of the birth of Torquato Tasso, a special performance of the pastoral play of "Aminta" was given at the Teatro Argentina, on the 2nd ult. On this occasion, in imitation of the custom prevailing in the sixteenth century, a number of madrigals were sung between the acts by members of the Cathedral choir.

PISA.—A new operatic work in two acts, entitled "Ruit Hora," by Ettore Ricca, bandmaster of an infantry regiment, was brought out recently at the Teatro Nuovo with considerable success.

PRENZLAU.—Musical festivals are growing apace in the Fatherland. The first East Prussian celebration of the kind was held here from the 17th to the 19th ult., among the more important numbers in the programme being the "Missa Papæ Marcelli," of Palestrina, performed in the beautiful St. Mary's Church.

TRIERS.—A new three-act opera, "Die Schwestern" (The Sisters), by Capellmeister Franz Kessel, has been brought out and repeatedly performed here with increasing success. The work is constructed, to some extent, upon Wagnerian lines, and is particularly rich in its orchestral colouring.

WEIMAR.—Hans Sommer's new comic opera, "Saint Foix," met with a very favourable reception on its recent first performance here, under Herr Lassen's direction.—The recent celebration of Herr Lassen's artist-jubilee took the form of a public ovation on the part of high and low in this art-loving little capital.

WUNSIEDEL.—An excellent performance is reported here, by the Bayreuth "Chorverein," of Mozart's "Requiem," Liszt's 13th Psalm, and Wagner's "Das Liebesmahl der Apostel"; the important tenor solo in Liszt's work being sung by Herr Burgstaller, a pupil of the Bayreuth Vocal Training School.

MUSIC IN BRISTOL.

(FROM OUR OWN CORRESPONDENT.)

THE annual Festival of the Bristol Church Choral Union, which took place in Bristol Cathedral on the 14th ult., was a very great success. Not only was the number of singers very large, but the music was sung with even greater excellence than hitherto. The Magnificat and Nunc dimittis were Dr. Lloyd's setting in D, and the anthems were "O God the King of Glory" by Henry Smart and Dr. Garrett's "The Lord is loving unto every man." The services of Mr. John Barrett (Conductor) and Mr. Hill (Organist) deserve warm recognition.

The first Conference of the members of the Western Section of the Incorporated Society of Musicians, organised by Mr. John Barrett, took place in Bristol, on the 3rd ult., and was attended by gratifying results. At the morning meeting Mrs. Roekel read a paper on "From Ballad Tune to Sonata Form," written by Miss Oliveria Prescott, who was kept away by illness; in the afternoon, Dr. A. H. Mann gave an address on the composing of "The Messiah"; and in the evening Mr. W. H. Cummings narrated some interesting details in the life of Handel.

A commendable representation of Barnett's "Ancient Mariner," by St. Mary's Church (Clifton) Choral Society, with the aid of Miss Rose Howard, Miss Annie Boucher, Mr. W. H. Lewis, and Mr. W. Follett as soloists, on April 30, deserves to be noted. Mr. W. H. Wickes rendered acceptable aid in the second division of the programme, which contained part-songs, and also the popular Dances from E. German's "Henry VIII.," music, which were crisply played by the band.

The second annual Concert of Knowle Musical Society took place on the 16th ult., under the control of Mr. W. J. Kidner. Part-songs, glees, and vocal and instrumental solos made up the programme. Miss Florence Crome and Mr. J. W. Davey contributed songs, and Miss Shipway and Mr. H. Logan played instrumental pieces.

At the seventh annual Concert of the Bristol Society of Instrumentalists, on the 15th ult., the Overtures "Athalie" and "Ruy Blas" (Mendelssohn), and "Le Pré aux Clercs" (Hérold); Gade's Symphony in B flat (Op. 20), and Gounod's "Faust" ballet music were well performed, under the direction of Mr. Riseley. Mr. Theo. Carrington's violin solo was Sarasate's "Zigeunerweisen," and Miss F. Crome and Mr. W. Thomas contributed vocal pieces to the accompaniment of Miss Rose Thomas.

A remarkably fine performance of Gounod's "Faust" was given on the 2nd ult., by the Weston-super-Mare Philharmonic Society, under the guidance of Mr. Edward Cook. It was evident, from the zest and finish with which the beautiful choral portions were sung, that the opera had been carefully studied, and the excellent results redound to the credit of the members. Madame Adelaide Mullen, Mrs. G. E. Alford, Messrs. H. Beaumont, Montague Worlock, Gilbert King, and A. E. Masters were the principal vocalists.

Two Concerts were given on April 27, by the Downend Choral Society, who, in the afternoon, unfolded the beauties of Gade's "The Erl-King's Daughter," the principals being Mrs. Harold Bernard, Miss Marion Harris, and Mr. W. Ernest Young. In the evening Mendelssohn's "Hymn of Praise" and "Hear my Prayer" were performed, the soloists being Miss A. J. Coleman, Miss Florence Harris, the Rev. A. J. Beedle, Mr. H. Palmer, and Mr. F. Hill. A spirited part-song by Eaton Fanning also received adequate treatment at both Concerts. Mr. Harold Bernard conducted. Instrumental pieces were contributed by Mrs. Skelton, Miss K. Purcell, Miss Maud Riseley, and Miss Mabel Riseley.

MUSIC IN DUBLIN.

(FROM OUR OWN CORRESPONDENT.)

THE Dublin Musical Society's third Concert took place at the Royal University of Ireland, on April 25, and was of particular interest on account of the production of a new work specially written for the Society by its Conductor. Dr. Joseph Smith's "Festmesse," or Festal Mass, is a religious work of noble proportions, and is designed rather for concert than church use. Its themes are remarkable for melodic gracefulness, and the choral and orchestral work is very varied in character, presenting antiphonal, fugal, and other effects, ranging from densely built-up ensemble to the simplest a capella. The work was rendered with enthusiasm by the choir and band of 380 performers, and on its conclusion the composer was presented with a jewelled bâton by the members of the choir. The second part of the Concert consisted of selections from Sullivan's "Ivanhoe," and was no less creditably done. The solo quartet consisted of Madame Amy Sherwin, Miss Corcoran, Mr. Henry Piercy, and Mr. Ffrangcon-Davies; Messrs. Thos. Marchant and John Horan, jun., taking part in the "Ivanhoe" music. Mr. John Horan, sen., presided at the organ, and Mr. Th. Werner led the strings.

An oratorio performance was given at St. Patrick's Cathedral, on April 26, for the purpose of erecting a memorial window to the late Sir Robert Stewart. Selections from the "Creation" and "The Messiah" were sung by the combined choirs of St. Patrick's and Christ Church Cathedrals.

Herr Werner's twelfth Violin Recital took place at the Ancient Concert Rooms on the 3rd ult. Mendelssohn's E minor Concerto and Tartini's "Trille du Diable" were splendidly given by Herr Werner, and in Mozart's G minor Quartet and Schubert's "Trout" Quintet he had the assistance of Messrs. Poland, Grisard, Rawlingson, May, and Bast, with Miss Florence Connor at the pianoforte. Miss Elsnor contributed two songs.

The Sackville Hall Musical Society performed Bennett's "May Queen," with a miscellaneous second part, on the 7th ult., under the direction of Dr. T. R. G. Joze. Miss Shellard and Mr. T. Marchant were the principal vocalists.

St. George's Choral Union produced Cowen's "Rose Maiden," with miscellaneous first part, at St. George's Parochial Hall, on the 13th ult., under Mr. Raymond Revelle, with band and chorus of seventy performers.

Haydn's "Creation" was performed with much success at the Leinster Hall on the 18th ult., with full band and chorus of 300 voices, for the funds of the Vincent de Paul Society. The soloists were Miss Harriet Byrne, Mr. John Weldon, and Mr. Ludwig. Mr. P. Goodman was Conductor; Mr. F. Manley, Organist; and Mr. Th. Werner, leader.

MUSIC IN EAST ANGLIA.

(FROM OUR OWN CORRESPONDENT.)

THE Festival Committee chose for its third interim Concert, in St. Andrew's Hall, on the 2nd ult., Costa's Oratorio "Eli," a work that had not been heard in Norwich since 1867, and the large attendance amply justified the selection, although it is generally admitted that with a few exceptions the music is heavy and commonplace. The principal quartet of vocalists were Madame Clara Samuel, Miss Sarah Berry, Mr. Whitney Mockridge, and Signor Novara, the minor parts being allotted to Mr. Sawford Dye and Mr. J. B. Smith (Peterborough Cathedral). The Philharmonic Society, supported by several professionals in the wind department, was responsible for the accompaniments, with Dr. Hill at the Conductor's desk and Dr. Bunnett at the organ. The choruses went splendidly, light and shade, with power and vigour when necessary, proving how painstaking had been the drilling by Dr. Hill.

On the 9th ult. the Norwich Orchestral Union gave its fifth Concert, in St. Andrew's Hall. The Concert opened with a capital performance of Mozart's Overture to "La Clemenza di Tito," followed by a cantata composed by Mr. J. A. Harcourt, a brother of the Conductor, for soprano and contralto soli with chorus. A good account of the solos was given by Miss Louise Burns and Mrs. Reyner. In the second part vocal and instrumental selections were given.

The forty-eighth Concert of the Norwich "Gate House" Choir took place on the 10th ult. The programme consisted of a very happy selection of part-songs, choruses, &c. Under the conductorship of Mr. Kingston Rudd since its foundation, twenty-four years since, this Society has always been celebrated for its perfect part-singing. Mr. Kingston Rudd's ability as a pianist is widely known, and his finished performance of Liszt's "Le Carnaval de Pesth" was much admired. Mr. Leo Stern played several violoncello solos, and the two artists were also heard in Mendelssohn's Variations Concertantes (Op. 17).

The annual Glee and Madrigal Concert organised by the Cathedral Choir, which took place in St. Andrew's Hall, on the 14th ult., was a marked success. The glees, madrigals, and part-songs of all periods which were included in the programme were sung with great refinement and finish, a result for which thanks are eminently due to the Cathedral Organist (Dr. Bates). Locke's music to "Macbeth" was a welcome addition to the programme, and was remarkably well given. Master E. Self, Mr. S. Hemmings, and Mr. Brockbank took the solos.

The Norwich Philharmonic Society, the only body devoted solely to orchestral works in the city, gave its eighty-ninth Concert, on the 16th ult., in Noverre's Room, conducted by Dr. Horace Hill, and led by Mr. F. W. B. Noverre, both gentlemen having occupied these positions for many years. The symphonic works were Haydn's No. 13 in G (London Philharmonic Catalogue, letter V.) and the first two movements of Beethoven's C minor. The Overtures to "Cenerentola" and "Zauberflöte," with one or two lighter pieces, were included in the programme. Miss Frances Acton and Mrs. Warwick, both residents in the locality, contributed several vocal excerpts.

A special Service of Praise was held in Holy Trinity Church, Norwich, on the 9th ult., when Schubert's "Song of Miriam" was sung, under the direction of Mr. James Muirhead. The soloist was Miss Alice Watling, of Ipswich.

Mr. H. F. Howlett's String Band and Singing Class, composed of working girls, gave a Concert on April 30, in St. Andrew's Hall. Part-songs by the choir and selections by the band were happily interspersed with songs, violin, piccolo, clarinet, and euphonium solos.

The King's Lynn Musical Society gave the second Concert of the season on April 26, at which Handel's "Acis and Galatea" formed the first part of the programme, conducted by Mr. Arthur Cross. The solos were sung by Madame Adelaide Mullen, Mr. Henry Beaumont, and the Rev. E. J. Alvis. The usual Lynn chorus was strengthened by the Hunstanton Musical Society on this occasion, while the accompaniments were played by an efficient string orchestra led by Mr. F. W. B. Noverre. A very good performance of the work was followed by a miscellaneous selection in which the above artists took part.

The Diss Choral Society essayed Handel's "Acis and Galatea" at its closing Concert this season on the 7th ult. Mr. T. M. Pullen, the Conductor, is to be congratulated on the good result of his training. Miss Blanche Powell, Mr. Harry Stubbs, and Mr. Vernon Taylor (of St. Paul's Cathedral) were the soloists; while the band, led by Mr. F. W. B. Noverre, consisted chiefly of residents in the town. Part-songs and vocal solos formed the second part of the evening's entertainment.

Under the auspices of the Eye Musical Society a performance of Mendelssohn's "Hymn of Praise" took place in the Corn Hall, on the 2nd ult., under the conductorship of Mr. Bray.

A successful Concert, in connection with the Fakenham Choral Society, was given in the Assembly Room on the 18th ult. The following performers assisted in carrying out the programme most satisfactorily: Mrs. Barber, Mrs. Bagnall, Mrs. Rowell, Mr. S. Hemmings (Norwich Cathedral), and Mr. G. J. Spinks, vocalists; Miss H. R. Pope and Mr. S. T. Hayward, violin; Miss G. Dixon, harp. - Mr. H. Hutchinson conducted, and Miss K. Andrews was the accompanist.

The Ipswich Philharmonic Society made its annual public appearance on April 30, conducted, as usual, by Mr. Charles Cooke. The band, numbering about forty performers, gave a very good rendering of the Largo and Finale from Haydn's Symphony (No. 13), the Overtures to "Rosamunde" and "Cenerentola," as well as a selection from "Traviata." It is to be hoped that next season a complete Symphony will be undertaken. Miss Kathleen Walton, Mr. A. J. Leighton, Master Harry Bridge, and Mr. Elliot Hooper were the vocalists engaged, and Mr. A. J. Raven played Weber's Concertino for clarinet (Op. 26) in capital style.

The Ipswich Ladies' Orchestral Society, at its eighth annual appearance, adopted the unusual plan of giving a "Morning" Concert. The event took place on the 14th ult., but, judging from the appearance of the room, the change of time will not warrant a repetition. The fair performers, numbering about forty, were chiefly amateurs of the town and neighbourhood, and, under the conductorship of Mr. Lindley Nunn, played with precision and effect.

The Beccles Choral Society showed signs of ambition in choosing Parry's difficult "L'Allegro ed il Penseroso" for its last Concert, given in the Town Hall on the 13th ult.; but, under the training of Mr. W. W. Harvey, the chorus made a very satisfactory appearance. The band, composed mainly of residents, was led by Mr. W. A. Tuddenham, who in the second half was heard in a violin solo. Madame George and Mr. Bantock Pierpoint were the soprano and baritone soloists.

The second Concert of the season, in connection with the Bungay Choral Society, was successfully given on the 15th ult. Mendelssohn's "Hymn of Praise" was the work undertaken. Miss Evelyn Ogle and Mr. S. Hemmings were the soloists, the band being led by Mr. F. W. B. Noverre. The second half of the programme consisted of the usual miscellaneous selection.

MUSIC IN LIVERPOOL.

(FROM OUR OWN CORRESPONDENT.)

THE annual business meeting of the Philharmonic Society—which has come to be regarded as a merely formal event—took place on the 10th ult., under the presidency of Mr. W. H. Wilson, who is the chairman of the expiring season. It was resolved to continue the usual course of giving twelve Concerts in the next series, and votes of thanks to Sir Charles Hallé, Mr. H. A. Branscombe (chorusmaster), and the choristers for their past services were recorded after the accustomed manner. The accounts presented no novelty, and the proceedings were, in fact, little more than of a perfunctory order.

At the annual proclamation of awards connected with the Liverpool Music School, on the 18th ult., in St. George's Hall, the Lord Mayor, Mr. H. E. Rensburg, and others spoke hopefully of the future of an establishment which has evidently won the confidence of the city corporation as well as of the public, and the basis of the operations of which needs enlarging. Dr. Hiles delivered an address admirable alike in matter and manner, and there was a large muster of the professors and students. A brief but very excellent Concert brought the proceedings to a close, the programme being provided by the scholarship holders and the orchestral and choral classes.

Two other gatherings of no little importance, and which were intimately associated with music itself as well as its surroundings, are worthy of being chronicled among the events of the past month; one of these being a delightful Recital, given by the well-known Schiever Quartet, for the delectation of their brethren and the friends of the Musical Club. This took place on the 4th ult., and a week later there was a large muster of members of the North-Western Section of the Incorporated Society of Musicians to hear Mr. E. Chadfield deal with "The Future of the Musical Profession." The one meeting was presided over by Mr. Martin Schneider and the other by Mr. W. D. Hall.

Among the Concerts of the month—for that matter, of the whole season—which claims special attention was that given, on the 8th ult., by the recently formed "Goossens" Choir, for by such a title—named after their founder—have the members elected to be known. Composed entirely of tenors and basses, and numbering about fifty voices, this organisation is one of which more will assuredly be heard, and the like of which has in many respects not previously appeared in the North of England. The chief efforts of the vocalists were a couple of lengthy descriptive choruses from the pen of Limnander, a Belgian writer, one of whose works, by the way, has been selected as a test piece for the coming Eisteddfod at Llandudno. The best of the compositions now under notice was entitled "At the tomb of the Janissaries"; but the other, "The Smugglers," appealed more to popular tastes. Both are, however, very clever, and full of picturesque writing, and to the latter the most ample justice was done. The music had been committed to memory, and an amount of light and shade was imparted to the whole which proved something of a revelation to those only accustomed to local choral efforts. Mr. Goossens conducted, and he and his choir received most cordial recognition. The organisation is founded upon co-operative principles, and has for its model a plan which works well in Belgium. It is expected that the fall of the present year will find plenty of work for this newest departure in the Northern provinces at least.

Mr. Charles Santley conducted his Mass at the Benedictine Church of St. Anne, at the celebration of the fiftieth anniversary of the opening of this fine building, on the 12th ult. The fourth local annual Festival of the Presbyterian Congregational Union took place on April 29, and the Welsh Baptists of the district held their twelfth yearly Psalmody Festival the same evening. The West Kirby Choral Society, under Mr. Kerfoot Jones, has given evidence of renewed vitality in a miscellaneous Concert. Mr. J. W. Collinson, one of the most able of local orchestral directors, has been appointed to the charge of the Victoria Pier, Blackpool. Messrs. Bartle and Riviere again have rival bands at the Pier and Pavilion respectively at Llandudno.

A new scheme of "Winter Evening Entertainments" is being organised at the Philharmonic Hall. Ten performances will take place between October 2 and February 26, at prices varying from 15s. to 25s. for the whole series. The season will start with an entertainment by Mr. George Grossmith, followed by a Chamber Concert, with Misses Macintyre, Clara Butt, Wietrowitz, and Mr. Borwick; a variety entertainment; a dramatic Recital by Mr. Charles Fry and Miss Olive Kennett, with Mrs. Trust, the Misses Salter, and M. Lemmoné; a Lecture on "The Himalayas," by Mr. Conway; a Ballad Concert, with the Meister Glee Singers; Lectures on "The Planets," by Sir Robert Ball, and on "Spiders that Work," by Dr. Dallinger; a Vocal and Pianoforte Recital, by Mr. Lloyd and Miss Eibenschütz; and a performance by the Liverpool Orchestral Society.

MUSIC IN NORTH STAFFORDSHIRE.

THE recently formed Kaliphonic Band made its first public appearance at Hanley on the 2nd ult. In addition to instrumental pieces, Miss Rosa Goldberg, Miss Ethel Whittaker, Mr. Guest, and Mr. Bradbury contributed solos.

The performance of "Iolanthe" by the members of the North Staffordshire Amateur Operatic Society was a distinct success, and the Victoria Hall was crowded on the 9th, 10th, and 11th ult. Mr. B. B. Barlow (Chancellor), Miss Ethel Whittaker (Queen), and Miss Lonsdale (Iolanthe) were prominent among the principals. The chorus was a very strong one and gave evidence of careful training.

Newcastle (St. George's) Choral Society performed "The Bride of Dunkerron" at the Municipal Hall, on the 9th ult. The chorus (numbering eighty voices), under the direction of Mr. T. Mason, sang with dramatic expression and vigour, and the soloists, Madame Smart, Mr. Ben Roberts, and Mr. Halward, assisted in the first and second parts of the programme. Mr. Joseph Cantor accompanied.

Mr. C. W. Perkins (Birmingham Town Hall) re-opened the organ of Wesley Chapel, Burslem, on the 16th ult. Messrs. Steele and Keay, of Burslem, had charge of the organ for repairs and alterations. Mr. Perkins presented a well-selected programme of organ music.

MUSIC IN NORTHUMBERLAND AND DURHAM.

A VERY interesting Concert was given on April 23 at Bishop Auckland, by the Auckland Musical Society, which is conducted by Mr. Nicholas Kilburn. The programme included several very interesting features, among them Dr. Villiers Stanford's dramatic setting of Tennyson's "The Revenge," to the performance of which additional interest was given by the reading of the poem by the Rev. E. Price, Vicar of Auckland. The work received an excellent interpretation by the choir and was greatly enjoyed. Another interesting feature was the performance of the greater portion of Handel's Fifth Chandos Anthem, a work which has probably never been heard in this locality before, and which is said to have been very rarely heard anywhere since the days of the composer of "The Messiah." Finally, the Concert included the performance of a new work by Mr. Kilburn, entitled "Babylon," for voices and orchestra, the words of which are taken from the Psalms. This work was listened to with the greatest attention, and will undoubtedly enhance its composer's reputation as a creative musician. The principal artists engaged were Miss Evangeline Florence, Mr. D. Ffrangcon-Davies, Miss Bertha Brouil (solo violin), and Mr. John Walton (solo violoncello). Mr. Kilburn conducted, and is to be congratulated upon the success of the Concert.

The recently formed Jesmond Choral Society gave a performance recently of Mr. F. H. Cowen's cantata "St. John's Eve," in the Parochial Hall, Jesmond, Newcastle-on-Tyne, under the direction of Mr. Claude H. Hill, Organist of Jesmond Parish Church.

On Tuesday, the 21st ult., the members of the College Choral Society gave their third annual Concert in the College of Science, Newcastle-on-Tyne. The programme included Mr. F. H. Cowen's cantata "The Rose Maiden" and Mendelssohn's Ninety-fifth Psalm, both of which were very creditably performed, under the direction of Mr. C. Sanford Terry. The soloists were Miss H. M. Stevenson, Miss M. Selke, Madame Marie Bellas, Mr. Frederic Spencer, and Mr. Terry. Mr. J. M. Preston presided at the pianoforte and Mr. W. G. Whittaker at the organ. An interesting feature of the Concert was the performance, for the first time, of a new student's song, "Salve Boreale Lumen," written by Professor J. W. Duff and composed by Mr. C. S. Terry, which was received with much enthusiasm. Exceptional interest was given to the occasion by the presence of Sir John Stainer.

The members of the South Shields Choral Society have presented their Conductor, Mr. W. Fairs, with a full score of Dvorák's "Spectre's Bride" as a memento of the recent successful performance of that work by the Society.

MUSIC IN SHEFFIELD AND DISTRICT.

THE Albert Hall was crowded on the 6th ult., when the Sheffield Musical Union performed "Elijah," under Dr. Coward. The rapid progress of this excellent musical organisation is one of the most encouraging facts in the musical history of the city. The Society, though only a young one, already possesses an enviable record, and has been the means of introducing to Sheffield several modern works of the first rank. The Committee has displayed commendable enterprise in its choice of works and management of the Society, and it is to be hoped that this wise policy will be adhered to in the future. Little comment need be made on the performance of "Elijah." The singing of the chorus is always the feature of the Union's concerts, and in such congenial music as that of Mendelssohn's masterpiece it was to be expected that the chorists would excel. The great choruses were impressively sung and in all cases elicited loud applause. Due attention was paid to shading, while the attack and quality of tone were faultless. The principals were Miss A. Norledge, Miss Lilian Hovey, Mr. H. Stubbs, and Mr. R. E. Miles. Miss Norledge, who is rapidly qualifying as an oratorio vocalist of sterling merit, sang the soprano music admirably; Miss Hovey and Mr. Stubbs both achieved surprising successes, and Mr. Miles rendered the music of the Prophet with all the fervour, passionate declamation, and devotional feeling which it calls for. Mr. Jessop was organist and Mr. Cox led the orchestra.

Dr. Hubert Parry visited Sheffield, on the 14th ult., on the invitation of the Amateur Instrumental Society. Dr. Parry had on one or two previous occasions honoured Sheffield and this Society by coming down to personally conduct several of his works, and by his compositions and personality he has won a host of friends and admirers. The Montgomery Hall was therefore filled to its utmost capacity on the 14th ult., when the programme included Dr. Parry's "English" Symphony and "Hypatian" Suite. In the former work the powers of the amateurs were fully tested, but they had been rehearsed with care, and as they include in their ranks most of the leading amateurs of the city and district, they played the Symphony admirably, and entirely to the satisfaction of Dr. Parry, who, much to their delight, gracefully told them so. Of the movements, the melodious Andante and the original Finale with its clever variations were the most applauded, although the Symphony was from first to last keenly enjoyed. Of the Suite, it suffices to say that the music and its rendering aroused the utmost enthusiasm, and, at the close of the "Orestes" March, Dr. Parry was loudly cheered and recalled by the delighted audience. The programme also included Bennett's overture "Wood Nymphs" and a selection from Balfe's "Satanella," both of which were conducted by Dr. Coward. During the evening a presentation was made to Dr. Parry by Alderman Wm. Smith, President of the Society, on behalf of the members of the band. The present consisted of a silver pocket-flask with cup enclosed in a morocco silk-lined case and handsomely engraved. The inscription bore the first four bars of the "Hypatia" Suite. The article was mainly the work of a member of the band. Dr. Parry, in a graceful little speech, thanked the members for their present. He said he shared the democratic spirit which characterised musical circles, and felt that the members of this society were his "brothers in art." He should value the present for its associations and as a pledge that the friendship between them would be maintained in the future.

The Wath Choral Society performed Handel's "Alceste," on the 13th ult., under the direction of Mr. G. M. Coates, Organist of the Parish Church. The second part of the programme consisted of glees, solos, and songs.

On the 24th ult. the Amateur Musical Society gave its sixty-third Concert in the Albert Hall, Sheffield. The programme consisted of Mendelssohn's 95th Psalm, Dr. Hubert Parry's "Allegro" (the first time in Sheffield), and a miscellaneous selection. The principals in the Psalm were Mrs. Morris, Miss Davy, and Mr. Arthur Dawes, and in Dr. Parry's work, Mrs. Ward and Mr. J. B. Eaton, Mr. Schollhammer (who for many years has directed these Concerts) conducted.

MUSIC IN THE SOUTHERN COUNTIES.

THE Sarum Choral Society's forty-seventh season opened on the evening of Thursday, the 2nd ult., with a performance of "Elijah." Mr. T. E. Aylward, of Cardiff, had been secured as Conductor, and a really fine band, led by Mr. F. Bartlett, had been engaged. The members of the Society mustered in full force, and gave a good rendering of the choral numbers of Mendelssohn's Oratorio, the singing of "Behold, God the Lord passed by," being especially admirable. The solo vocalists were Miss Elsie Mackenzie, Miss Edith Hands, Mr. H. Lewis Thomas, and Mr. Arthur Barlow. Altogether this may fairly be described as the best Concert given by the Sarum Choral Society for many years past. The usual performance of a selection from "Elijah" was given in the Cathedral on Ascension Day, Mr. C. F. South presiding at the organ. The Concert to be given this month in the County Hall, by the Test Valley Musical Society, is being looked forward to with unusual interest. Dr. Hubert Parry's "Job" will constitute the programme, and the Rev. E. H. Moberly will occupy his usual post of Conductor.

A large audience was present at the performance of "Elijah" by the Trowbridge Musical Union, given in the Town Hall on April 30, under the conductorship of Mr. H. Millington. The soloists were Miss Ethel Winn, Madame Florence Winn, Mr. A. Lawrence Fryer, and Mr. C. E. Poole. The singing of the choir was good throughout, and a thoroughly capable orchestra was led by Mr. Duys and Mr. W. Millington.

The fourth Concert of the Horningsham Choral Society, of which Mr. Wilburn is the Conductor, was given in the Marquis of Bath's Schoolroom on the 2nd ult. The programme consisted of Sir Joseph Barnby's Idyll, "Rebekah," and an interesting miscellaneous selection. The Society was assisted by Miss F. Monk, the Rev. H. A. Hickin, and the Rev. D. J. Thomas as solo vocalists, and the accompaniments were effectively played upon the pianoforte and harmonium by Mr. Brooks and the Rev. J. Firth respectively.

Dr. Hubert Parry's "Judith" was performed by the Newbury Choral Society, on the 7th ult., in the Corn Exchange. Much time and pains had been expended in the preparation of the work, under the direction of Mr. J. S. Liddle, and no previous effort of the Society had met with such signal success as attended this occasion. Dr. Parry himself conducted. Although the work makes considerable demands upon the ability and intelligence of all who take part in it, its performance was in every way worthy of the occasion. The choruses were sung with great spirit, the attack being uniformly good, and due regard was paid to light and shade. The band played splendidly, accompanying the solo voices with unusual delicacy and refinement. The tone of the wind instruments was remarkably fine. Miss Agnes Nicholls sang the parts allotted to Judith with clearness, intelligence, and beauty of tone; and the other lady soloists, Miss A. Wintle and Miss Lunn, were heard to great advantage throughout the work. Mr. Edward Branscombe won well-deserved applause for his rendering of the tenor music, and Mr. G. Gardner Leader, who possesses a good bass voice and an excellent delivery, was equally successful. The Oratorio met with a hearty reception, and the termination of the performance was followed by loud and continued applause.

Mr. J. S. Liddle recommended his Chamber Concerts, which have now reached their tenth season, on April 30. The programme included Mendelssohn's Octet in E flat for strings (Op. 20), two short pieces for violoncello solo by Hollman and Davidoff, and Gade's Octet in F (Op. 17). The executants were Miss D. Blunt, Miss Hare, Miss Arkwright, Miss Chattock, Mr. Liddle, Mr. H. Flint, and Mr. Clement Hann. Violin solos were played by Mr. Liddle, and Miss Helen Chattock contributed songs by Goring Thomas and Maude Valérie White. Other Concerts were given on the 16th, 23rd, and 30th ult., and the series will be continued this month.

The concluding Concert of the season in connection with the Romsey Musical Society took place at the Town Hall, on the 2nd ult., when Sterndale Bennett's cantata "The May Queen" was performed. The Society, under the conductorship of Mr. Moss, has made rapid strides since its previous appearance, and gave a creditable rendering of the graceful choral music. The principal vocalists were Madame Eva Scorey, Mr. Masters, and Mr. F. C. Tyack, and a small but effective orchestra was led by Mr. E. J. Tuck. A miscellaneous selection followed the cantata.

The organ at St. Mary's Church, Southampton, has been reconstructed and enlarged, and to celebrate the re-opening of the now fine instrument, a series of Recitals has been arranged. Mr. H. L. Balfour, Mr. Fountain Meen, Dr. S. Corbett, and Mr. A. N. Price are amongst the organists taking part in the series. Madame Lily Lowe gave an Invitation Concert at the Philharmonic Hall, on the 15th ult., when a cantata, "Merry May," was performed by a choir of eighty children. The singing and the general "get-up" of the juvenile choristers were excellent, and reflected great credit upon Madame Lowe, who conducted.

On April 30 Mr. Howard May's Orpheus and Madrigal Society, numbering some seventy members, gave two highly successful Concerts at the Pavilion, Bournemouth. With the exception of some excellent violoncello solos by Miss Maud Fletcher, the programme at each Concert consisted entirely of glees, all of which were sung with much taste and effect. The Symphony Concerts, which Mr. Dan Godfrey, jun., has given with so much success at the Winter Gardens during the winter, have come to an end, and the full military band, which takes the place of the orchestral band in the summer months, made its first appearance on the 13th ult. Among its members are several well-known players. Mr. Slivinski gave a Pianoforte Recital at the Shaftesbury Hall on the afternoon of the 4th ult. Mr. Slivinski's playing was characterised by its usual brilliancy and infinite variety, and his reception was very cordial and enthusiastic. The St. Michael's Institute Choral Society made its second appearance this season, on the 6th ult., at the Shaftesbury Hall, when Cowen's old English Idyll, "St. John's Eve," formed the chief part of the programme. The tunefulness of the music of this charmingly melodious work had made its usual impression upon the members of the Society, who entered into their work with evident appreciation and pleasure, singing the delightful choruses with all the necessary life and spirit. Madame Grant as Nancy and Miss Winnie Cook as Margaret sang with intelligence and power, Mr. Harry Partridge won deserved applause for his pleasing portrayal of the Young Squire, and Mr. R. A. Grant was successful in the part of Robert. The band, led by Signor Bertoncini, was excellent, and the whole Concert reflected the greatest possible credit upon Mr. A. W. Russe, the genial Conductor of the Society.

MUSIC IN YORKSHIRE.

THE only musical event of real importance during the past month in Yorkshire has been a brief but interesting Festival at Bridlington, on the 16th ult. Bridlington, out of the summer season, is not a town characterised by any abnormal activity in matters artistic. But it happens that in the neighbourhood there dwells an amateur musician, Mr. A. W. M. Bosville, who possesses both energy and ability enough to plan and carry through a Festival that would, under ordinary circumstances, be impracticable. Though it may prejudice the event in the eyes of the business-like Briton, it must be acknowledged that the Bridlington Festival is not on a sound "self-supporting basis," nor could it pay its way without liberal subsidies generously provided by Mr. Bosville. Of the two Concerts comprised in the Festival, one was miscellaneous, while the other consisted of Mendelssohn's "Elijah," the safest of all oratorios as a means of attracting an audience. Professor Stanford's "Revenge" was the chief thing in the afternoon programme, which also included a novelty, in the shape of two movements from a Suite—incomplete as yet, we believe—by Mr. Camidge, the organist of Beverley Minster. The composer's sense of melody and rhythm is shown to advantage in the first movement, an agreeable and vigorous Allegro moderato. The second is styled a Tempo di Minuetto, which suggests rather more rhythmical movement than it, in fact, possesses, though this may be in part due to the exceedingly slow time in which it was taken by the composer, who conducted. It is to be hoped Mr. Camidge will be encouraged by the success of his work to complete it. In "The Revenge," and afterwards in "Elijah," the chorus of the Bridlington Musical Society, numbering 150 voices, and drawn entirely from the immediate neighbourhood, sang with much vigour and good will. Considering that this is but the second season of their operations, further improvement in such matters as confidence of attack, attention to the beat, and variety of power may be fairly expected. A fairly efficient band, with a sprinkling of competent amateurs in the strings and percussion, was heard to the best advantage in the "Meister-singer" Overture and the movement "Ase's Death," from the first "Peer Gynt" Suite. A coarseness in the woodwind was its worst fault. The principal vocalists were Miss Agnes Nicholls, Miss Eva Bedford, Mrs. Bosville, Miss Kirkby Lunn, and Messrs. Winsloe Hall and Harford, most of whom have recently emerged from the state of pupillage at the Royal College. The excellent singing of Miss Lunn, and the perfect intonation of Miss Nicholls, deserve especial mention. Mr. Bosville conducted with much ability, and the people of Bridlington are greatly indebted to him for his disinterested efforts in the cause of Art.

The Yorkshire Section of the Incorporated Society of Musicians has been conferring at Leeds, on the 4th ult. Under the presidency of Dr. Crow, the Ripon organist, papers were read by Dr. C. W. Pearce, on "Privileges and Responsibilities of Membership in the Incorporated Society of Musicians," and by Mr. Edward Chadfield, the general secretary of the Society, on "The Future of the Profession." Though nothing particularly novel was advanced by the speakers, they held up a standard which it would be well for the profession in these parts to follow. On the 7th ult. the Leeds Symphony Society gave a Concert, with a programme of unusually ambitious nature for an orchestra consisting almost entirely of amateurs. Saint-Saëns's "Danse Macabre," Sir A. C. Mackenzie's First Scottish Rhapsody—one of his most satisfactory works, by the way—and Wieniawski's Second Violin Concerto, in which a young player, Mr. G. E. Cathie, was the soloist, were all compositions new to Leeds; and with Haydn's E flat Symphony and Beethoven's "Egmont" Overture made up a most interesting programme, and were very creditably played. Miss Mary Poole was the vocalist and Mr. A. J. Gutfeld the Conductor.

At York an amateur Concert took place on April 30, deserving mention on account of the quaint idea underlying it. The platform, transformed into an eighteenth century drawing-room, was supposed to be in the home of a certain Mistress Gage, who was represented as entertaining her friends at a party given in the year 1792. Dressed in the fashionable attire of the time, her guests gave, in turn, songs, catches, recitations, and instrumental pieces, chosen, we may assume, with reference to the period. The Bedale Society availed itself of the opportunity afforded by its "Elijah" Concert, on the 2nd ult., to give its honorary Conductor, the Hon. Lucien Orde-Powlett, a gold chronometer as an acknowledgment for many years' service in that capacity. The principal vocalists were Madame Squire, Mrs. Rouse, Mrs. Burrell, Mr. Braxton Smith, and Mr. J. Sandbrook. Cowen's "St. John's Eve" and a miscellaneous second part formed the programme of a Concert given by the Knaresborough Philharmonic Society, on the 1st ult. Miss Annie Jackson, Miss M. Kay, Mr. C. H. Riley, and Mr. J. Browning were the soloists, and Mr. C. L. Naylor conducted. The Hull Orchestral Society gave a Concert, on the 9th ult., at which Mendelssohn's "Italian" Symphony, and Overtures by Beethoven ("Egmont"), Reissiger, and Kreutzer were played, under Mr. G. H. Smith's honorary conductorship. Miss Florence Monk and Miss Jennie Langford were the vocalists. An Organ Recital, at St. Mary's Roman Catholic Church, Bradford, given by Mr. J. H. England, on the 13th ult., may be briefly mentioned, as it served to inaugurate the renovated organ, a large instrument built by Anneessens in 1888. Among the alterations recently effected, a tubular pneumatic action has been substituted for the original electric action.

The North-East Cathedrals Choir Festival will be held at Ripon Cathedral on July 22, when it is hoped that the Archbishop of York will be present. Gaul's cantata "The Ten Virgins" will be given. In view of the works that have been given at previous Festivals, the choice is rather singular.

MUSIC IN AMERICA.

(FROM OUR OWN CORRESPONDENT.)

THE concluding season of grand opera at the Metropolitan was marked by no special feature, except the production of Mozart's "Figaro," which for some unaccountable reason was reserved until the eleventh hour. As we write, a company, of which Madame Taverly and Mr. Theo. Dorré are the particular stars, has undertaken a season at the Grand Opera House—a theatre which has long been considered obsolete and out of the way for this order of entertainments. The success of Mr. Dammrosch's season of Wagnerian work has been such that Messrs. Abbey and Grau announce a separate subscription of ten performances in German for next winter. These will begin in the third week of the season. It is also likely that some German operas will be introduced into the regular list and into the number of Saturday night "Populars" as well. For these works Mr. Seidl's services as Conductor have been retained, but beyond this no engagements are yet announced.

The production of Dr. Dvorák's new national cantata, "The American Flag," by the New York Musical Society, was extremely creditable to all concerned in its performance. It was the first appearance of the Society, and its Conductor, Mr. Frank G. Dossert, though a church organist and choirmaster of long experience, was somewhat ill at ease at first in conducting; but the chorus work stamped the new association as deserving of its share of public favour. The choice, by Dr. Dvorák, of Drake's poem for musical treatment was not altogether a fortunate one, and the composer seems to have worked heavily under the load of stilted imagery and high-flown rhetoric with which it abounds from beginning to end. Dr. Dvorák has said and done so much toward encouraging American composers to at least make an honest and earnest effort towards using what little available material there is which can fairly be called national, that it is to be regretted that his own "national cantata" seems unlikely to occupy the position for which he intended it.

On the 8th ult. the Church Choral Society and the Oratorio Club, of Brooklyn, gave a combination Concert in that city, presenting Dvorák's Mass in D and Gade's "Crusaders."

On the 9th ult. Mr. Charles Whitney Coombs, Organist of the Church of the Holy Communion, New York, gave an initial performance of a sacred cantata from his own pen. Though scored for orchestra, the composer was forced to content himself with pianoforte and organ accompaniment; but in spite of these limitations and of a not very efficient staff of soloists, he succeeded in obtaining quite an effective rendering of quite an effective work. His composition is of decidedly sentimental order, and its topic, "The Vision of St. John," gives ample opportunities for descriptive writing, of which he has availed himself cleverly. In the hands of a good chorus, and with better soloists and an efficient orchestra, this composition will prove a creditable addition to the small list of American works of its kind.

The Boston Symphony Society, under Mr. Max. Pauer, has just closed its regular season, which has, in many respects, proved a memorable one. Fifty-three composers have been represented on its programmes during the past winter. Of these five have been Americans—Professor John H. Paine, Mr. G. W. Chadwick, Mr. Arthur Foote, Mr. H. W. Parker, and Mr. Henry H. Huss—the first four being Bostonians and the last a New Yorker. The band has improved notably in training and finish, and has made a brilliant record.

Musical matters in Chicago are quiet at present. Mr. Theodore Thomas and his orchestra have "taken the road." Their last act before departing was to assist in the inauguration of the new Steinway Hall. This building will, it is believed, fill a want which has been felt in Chicago for some time. The seating capacity of the new audience-room will be about 900, and the floors remaining above it have been fitted up with especial reference for use as studios for teachers. A number of the best instructors have already secured quarters there. On the seventh floor there is a recital hall, seating 300. The large room contains a concert-organ, which has been inaugurated by recitals given by Messrs. Clarence Eddy and William Middlerschulte.

On the 26th inst. a party of American organists will sail for England on the steamer Berlin for a tour among the Cathedrals. A few of the Continental Cathedrals will also be visited, and the party will return some time in August.

Mr. R. Huntington Woodman, who is organist of the First Presbyterian Church of Brooklyn, and is music editor of the New York Evangelist, will have charge of the voyagers, and it is said that arrangements have been made in advance by which special advantages will be accorded them in studying the music and the organs in the Cathedrals of England, France, and Belgium. Quite a goodly number of church musicians are taking advantage of this opportunity to make an economical trip abroad, and it is likely that the party will be a large one.

The "Swan and the Skylark" was given, for the first time in this country, on April 29, with full orchestra and chorus of 150 voices, by the Mendelssohn Union, Orange, New Jersey. This is a private organisation, and they performed the work admirably. The soloists were Miss C. Maconda, Mrs. Katherine Bloodgood, Mr. W. Dennison, Dr. Carl Dufft, and the Conductor, Mr. Arthur Mees.

MUSIC IN PARIS.

(FROM OUR OWN CORRESPONDENT.)

At the Opéra, on the 13th ult., Wagner's "Tannhäuser," translated into French by M. Charles Nutter, was given here for the first time for over thirty years. This was the fourth performance, the first three having taken place on March 13, 18, and 24, 1861. The result of these three performances is well known in musical history. An ignorant and uproarious "Cabale" made the performances a scandal and caused the failure of the opera. Matters have altered very much since then, and the whirligig of time has brought Wagner his revenge by the brilliant successes of his works, and this revival of "Tannhäuser" was the occasion of a fresh triumph. The public were able to distinguish between the system of the Old School and that which belongs essentially to the genius of Wagner, so that in spite of a certain amount of disdain affected by pure Wagnerians, the work produced a deep impression. M. Van Dyck was an admirable Tannhäuser—in fact, he is the only one in the cast who possesses the traditions of Wagnerian art; and the other artists, in spite of their undoubted ability, seemed to sing in too stilted a manner. The importance of this reproduction induces us to give the names of all the artists:—M. Van Dyck (Tannhäuser), Madame Caron (Elizabeth), Mdlle. Bréval (Venus), Mdlle. Agussal (The Shepherd Boy), M. Renaud (Wolfram), and M. Delmas (The Landgrave). It is safe to predict a long run for the work.

Orchestral Concerts ceased at Easter, except that M. Colonne gave two more Concerts for the rendering of important portions of Wagner's "Rheingold."

At the Concert which took place on April 21, the music of the third scene from "William Ratcliff," by M. X. Leroux, was performed for the first time. This is unquestionably an interesting work, but the perpetual loudness of the music makes it rather monotonous. The piece is modern in style, and MM. Fournets and Gibert sang their respective parts with much expression.

M. Lamoureux, at a meeting of the members of his orchestra, announced that a new concert hall was in course of construction. Everyone is aware that the Concerts given by this well-known orchestra at present take place in a circus. The eminent Conductor is at this moment organising classes for singing (the entrance being gratis), and from these classes he proposes to form a select choir for future choral performances.

At M. Guilman's second Organ Recital, with orchestra, given at the Trocadéro, on April 18, this distinguished organist was heard in his Fifth Sonata (played for the first time). The work is both serious and interesting in style, and is in five different movements. The "Venite ad me," for tenor solo (an extract from the sacred Symphonies), by H. Schütz (1585-1672), was much appreciated.

M. Paderewski has given three Concerts with customary success. The pieces performed belong to the répertoire most affected by the great pianists of the day. Specially noticeable at the Concert that took place on the 2nd ult. was the very fine rendering of the Variations on a theme of Paganini by Brahms.

At the Théâtre d'Application, on April 27, was performed, for the first time, the "Chansons parlées et dansées dites," the poem written by Mdlle. Marie Kryszinska, the musical accompaniment being composed by M. Paul Bergon. Madame Segond-Weber and M. Hirsch recited, while the author accompanied at the pianoforte. The success of the experiment was sufficiently marked, and as a result three more performances will be given.

We must not omit to mention the Concerts given by Mdlle. Kleeberg, nor that held at the Institut Rudy, on April 27, by the Société de Musique d'Ensemble, under the direction of M. René Lenormand. This is the sixty-ninth Concert which the Society has given, and the programme contained many features of interest; two pieces by the director, "Pour ce qui in furent pas aimés," sung by Madame Collier, and an unpublished duet, sung for the first time by Mdlle. Remy and M. Dejaridin, being encored.

M. Widor went to Rouen, on April 28, for the purpose of performing his new Symphony for the organ, entitled "Symphonie Gothique," at the Church of St. Ouen. This work has been very highly praised.

The ceremony of the inauguration of the monument erected to Félicien David, at the centenary of Saint-Germain, was announced to take place on the 22nd ult., in the presence of the most distinguished musicians of the capital. M. Reyers was to deliver a discourse in memory of the departed artist.

The first performance of the new opera "Guernica," of MM. Gaillard and Ghensi, the music by M. Paul Vidal, was announced to take place on the 27th ult.

The directors of the Opéra propose giving a series of Concerts during next winter, in which a number of works by young French composers are to obtain a first hearing. The Concerts are to be under the direction of MM. Paul Vidal and Georges Marty.

We have been favoured with the following particulars of the prospective musical proceedings in connection with the annual meeting of the German Society of Musicians (Allgemeine Deutsche Musik-Verein), to be held this month at Brunswick—viz., On the first day (12th inst.), a performance of Bach's cantata "Ein feste Burg" and of Berlioz's "Requiem"; on the second day (13th inst.), Concert of Chamber Music; third day (14th inst.), Grand Concert at the Court Theatre, orchestra and soli, under Herr Mottl's direction; fourth day (15th inst.), second Concert of Chamber Music; fifth day (16th inst.), grand Concert in the Egidienhalle, orchestra, chorus and soli, under direction of Herren Nicodé and Riedel—all the performances taking place in the evening. The following are the works which will obtain a hearing in the course of the four last-named Concerts: "Der Mensch und das Lieben," for chorus and orchestra (E. d'Albert); "Nuits d'été" (Berlioz); Quintet and Trio (Brahms); Tragic Symphony (Felix Dräseke); Quartet (Dvorák); "Faust" Symphony and Pianoforte Concerto in A major (Liszt); Overture and Intermezzo from "Donna Diana" (Reznicek); "Kaisermarsch" and Bachanal and Venus-Tannhäuser Scene from the Paris revision of the score (Wagner). Amongst the executants may be mentioned: Frau Mottl-Standhartner; Herren d'Albert, Paul Kalisch, Professor Heerman, Hugo Becker, and others. The orchestra will consist of the members of the Ducal Orchestra, reinforced by artists from the Royal Orchestra of Hanover; the chorus will be the united Chorgesang-Verein, Schroder's a capella choir, and members of various male choirs. A performance of Hans Sommer's opera "Loreley" will be given on the evening preceding the actual meeting—viz., on Tuesday, 11th inst., to which members, having made application to the Intendant of the Hof-Theater not later than the 8th inst., will obtain free admission.

Mr. J. A. FULLER MAITLAND delivered four of a course of Lectures on "The History of English Music," at King's College (Ladies' Department), Kensington Square, on the Wednesday mornings of last month. In the first, a summary was given of the beginnings of artistic music in England, of the various treatises that appeared, and some account of the work of Dunstable, Hothby, and others. The examples were vocal, and consisted of the rota, "Sumer is i cumen in," a newly deciphered three-part motet by Dunstable, "Quam pulchra es," and the famous "Agin-court Song." At the second Lecture, "Byrd and the Madrigalists," the development of the English madrigal from the Italian examples transmitted to Nicholas Yonge was traced, and examples from Byrd to Gibbons were given by a party of singers, among whom were the Misses Layton, Miss Florence Christie, Messrs. Walter Ford and Douglas Powell. The instrumental music of the Elizabethan era was the subject of the third Lecture, "Dowland and the Lutenists," examples being played on the lute and virginals by Mr. Dolmetsch and the lecturer respectively. At the fourth, "Lawes and the Monodists," the gradual influence of the Italian musical revolution of 1600 was described, and, among other examples, two songs from Lawes's "Comus" music were sung by Mrs. Hutchinson. The latter half of the course will be given on Tuesdays, the 11th, 18th, and 25th inst. and July 2, at 12 o'clock, and the titles of the Lectures are: "Purcell and the dramatists," "Arne and the eighteenth century composers," "Bennett and the nineteenth century composers," and "The living composers."

At the May Examination for Degrees in Music at the University of Oxford the following satisfied the Examiners:—First Examination for the degree of Bachelor in Music: Henry L. Adams (Non-Collegiate and Hull); William Boggiss (New College and Reading); John A. Clegg (Queen's College and Rochdale); Thomas Jenkins (Queen's College and Crickhowell); Henry H. Pinches (Non-Collegiate and South Belgrave); William B. Ross (Queen's College and Montrose, N.B.); Donald F. Tovey (Balliol College). In the Second Examination for the Degree of Bachelor in Music: William B. Brierley (Queen's College and Eccleston, Chester); Henry B. Collins (New College and King's Lynn); Albert H. Edwards (Queen's College and Brecon); Alfred E. Gregory (Queen's College and Lanark, N.B.); Walter Harrison (New College and Jersey); Ernest W. Holmyard (New College and New Shoreham); Arthur T. Robinson (Queen's College and Buxton); Augustus E. Tozer (New College and West Brighton); James C. Wainwright (Queen's College and St. Neots). The Examiners were Sir John Stainer (Professor of Music), Dr. C. Hubert H. Parry (Choragus), and Dr. Haydn Keeton.

THE Sunday evening Orchestral Concerts at Queen's Hall, which, under Mr. Randegger, have been given with such admirably artistic results during April and May, will be discontinued during the summer. The first series ended on the 26th ult., when Beethoven's Pastoral Symphony was in the programme, and Miss de Sales sang sacred songs by Handel and Costa. In all eight Concerts have been given: Symphonies by Schubert, Beethoven, Mendelssohn, Mozart, and Haydn, and several of the greatest Overtures by these and other composers have been heard during the season. The audiences have been large, most attentive, and very enthusiastic. As the orchestra consisted of some fifty of our best instrumentalists, led by Mr. Carrodus, Mr. Randegger was able to secure performances of the highest excellence. That these were achieved without rehearsal is greatly to the credit both of band and Conductor. The Sunday afternoon Recitals of vocal and instrumental music will be continued as usual for the present.

THE Musical Artists' Society, at the Concert at St. Martin's Town Hall, on the 20th ult., offered a capital programme, in which the old and the new were effectively combined. An excellent beginning was made with Beethoven's String Quartet in A (No. 5, Op. 18), played by Messrs. J. Bláha, J. Beckwith, A. Wright, and B. Albert—the first-named taking the place of Mr. Karl Henkel, who was stated to be seriously ill. Among the other instrumental pieces were Miss Dora Bright's ingenious "Variations on a Theme by Sir G. A. Macfarren" for two pianofortes, performed by Misses Maude Wilson and Llewella Davies; and Miss Rosalind F. Ellicott's Sonata in D for pianoforte and violin, which, as interpreted by Messrs. Algernon Ashton and J. Bláha, so greatly pleased the audience that the composer was summoned. The vocalists were Mrs. Wilson-Osman, Miss Edith Leslie, Messrs. Trevelyn David, Douglas Powell, Henry Lindsay, and Wingrove.

THE Chamber Music Concert, at the Drill Hall, Hampstead, on the 18th ult., had some interesting features. The programme opened with Beethoven's Quartet for pianoforte, violin, viola, and violoncello in E flat (Op. 16), played with sufficient spirit and careful regard for expression by Messrs. Walford Davies, Hubert Hunt, Charles Jacoby, and W. E. Whitehouse. Two compositions by Mr. Walford Davies were given—a thoughtful Sonata for violin and pianoforte in E minor (played by Messrs. Jacoby and Davies) and a setting for bass solo with accompaniment of strings of Browning's "Prospice." The latter, heard for the first time, is a dignified and picturesquely suggestive treatment of the poem, and the vocal part was steadily delivered by Mr. Charles Magrath, who also acquitted himself well in Dr. Hubert Parry's two English songs, "Through the ivory gate" and "Of all the torments."

THE North-West London Philharmonic Society, under Mr. Bernhard M. Carrodus, has for some time done excellent service in unobtrusive fashion. At St. Martin's Town Hall, on the 10th ult., neat performances of a couple of movements from Beethoven's Second Symphony, of the Overtures to "Prometheus" and "Euryanthe," and of a couple of melodies for strings by Grieg, demonstrated the maintenance of proficiency already approvingly recognised. Master Philip Lewis, violinist, played Sarasate's "Zigeunerweisen" with such success that he gave as an extra piece a Romance by Tours; and Mr. Ernest Carrodus, by fulness of tone and complete command of his instrument, honourably won distinction in a solo for double bass. Vocal pieces were contributed by Miss Kate Cove and Mr. Arthur Thompson.

THE South London Choral Association selected for the final Concert of its twenty-seventh season Handel's "Jephtha," which brought a large audience to the South London Institute of Music, in the Camberwell New Road, on April 26. Convincing testimony to the power and pathetic beauty of this too-rarely heard Oratorio was afforded by the attention paid to both the chorus and solo parts—the latter in the efficient hands of Misses Margaret Hoare, Clarissa Talbot, and Hannah Jones; Messrs. Harper Kearton and R. E. Miles. The band (Mr. T. E. Gatehouse, leader) and chorus totalled 200 performers, and the rendering of the numbers in which both took part was characterised by appreciation of light and shade as well as by vigour. Mr. Leonard C. Venables conducted, and Mr. W. H. Harper was at the organ.

THE arrangements for the Memorial Service in celebration of Purcell are now fairly complete. The music will comprise Purcell's Te Deum in D and a series of his finest anthems. These will include a splendid Coronation Anthem, for orchestra and chorus, "Praise the Lord, O Jerusalem." This work is now being issued by Messrs. Novello, and has never before been printed. It has a complete Overture for strings (Adagio and Allegro), and is altogether a very fine example of Purcell. "O sing unto the Lord," "Remember not, Lord," and other less known anthems will also be sung. Dr. Bridge proposes to have a choir of at least 250 and a large orchestra. Many Cathedrals have expressed a desire to be represented on this occasion, and the assistance of precentors, organists, and members of Cathedral choirs will be, no doubt, readily welcomed.

A CONCERT was given at the Blind School, St. John's Wood, on the 16th ult., in aid of the funds of St. Mary the Virgin, Primrose Hill, by the St. Mary's Choral Society, conducted by Mr. John C. Ward. The programme included Barnby's "Rebekah"; a recitation from "Macbeth," by Mr. John L. Child and his clever pupil, Miss Florence Weston, with the incidental music attributed respectively to Locke and Purcell, sung by members of the Society; together with a miscellaneous selection, including Sullivan's "St. Agnes' Eve" by Miss Clementine Ward, with harp and organ accompaniment; harp solo by Miss Georgina Macdonald, and æola solos by Mr. John C. Ward. The soli in "Rebekah" were ably rendered by Mrs. Hamilton Tetley, Mr. Reginald Groome, and Mr. J. A. Macfarlane.

THE Post Office Musical Society's determination to perform "The Golden Legend" was so warmly approved by the host of friends of the Association and of Sir Arthur Sullivan's exquisite composition, that Queen's Hall was not large enough to contain them all on April 24. With Mr. Edward Lloyd in his original rôle of Prince Henry, Madame Marian McKenzie as Ursula, and Mr. Andrew Black as Lucifer there was the assurance of unsurpassable renderings of three of the principal solo parts. Mrs. Helen Trust, who hardly seemed in possession of her accustomed means, was the Elsie. The band was led by Mr. Ellis Roberts, and good intentions animated the chorus. The applause after a tasteful rendering of the "Evening Hymn" was so prolonged that Mr. Sydney Beckley, the Conductor, consented to a repetition.

WE have on previous occasions spoken in terms of high praise of the Catford Choral Society's performances, and the final Concert of the season, given at St. James's Hall, Forest Hill, on April 25, served to display once more the excellent results of the careful and laborious training of the choir by the Conductor, Mr. Alfred Furse. The programme consisted of Mendelssohn's "Hymn of Praise" and Rossini's "Stabat Mater." The soloists were Madame Isabel George, Miss Marie Hooton, Mr. Edward Branscombe, and Mr. Daniel Price; while Mrs. Toft sang the second soprano part in the "Hymn of Praise." Miss Ethel M. Brissenden and Mr. A. D. Arnott ably presided at the pianoforte and organ respectively; and a small orchestra, led by Mr. J. L. Kitcat, lent efficient and effective aid.

CONCERTS given for charitable purposes are exempt from the ordinary rules of criticism, but we cannot refrain from mentioning in very favourable terms the admirable performance given by Mr. Moberly's string orchestra in behalf of the Royal Hospital for Diseases of the Chest, at St. James's Hall, on the 17th ult. Two movements from a Serenade by the well-known violoncellist, Julius Klengel, two Icelandic melodies arranged by Svendsen, two German Dances by Schubert, Dvorák's Notturmo (Op. 40), and Grieg's Suite, "Aus Holberg's Zeit," were rendered with wonderful verve and spirit by the charming white-robed force of nearly a hundred young ladies. Songs were contributed by Mr. Albert Archdeacon, and Miss Katherine Ramsey played Grieg's Pianoforte Ballade (Op. 24).

THE number of musical entertainments given in London during the past month has been so large that for lack of space we are compelled to omit notices of several excellent Concerts, among which we may name Mr. Bonawitz's Historical Recital, Mr. Bispham's "Brahms" Concert, Mr. Tobias Matthay's Recital, Misses Ada Crossley and Laura Burnham's Concert, and the Recitals and Concerts given by Miss St. Angelo (a pupil of Mr. Beyschlag), Miss Nanney, Herr F. Masbach, the Handel Society, the Strauss Orchestra (which, by the way, has also played at Windsor Castle by command of the Queen), and the "Westminster" and "Strolling Players" Amateur Orchestral Societies.

MISS H. EDITH GREEN, who gave an Orchestral Concert, conducted by Mr. Gilbert R. Betjemann, on April 30, came before her audience in the ambitious capacity of composer of a long Orchestral Symphony and a Sonata for pianoforte and violin. The latter, which was played by Miss Ethel Barns and Miss Green, is a very feeble and disjointed composition that ought not to have been publicly performed; but the Symphony deserves the praise due to an earnest effort in the highest regions of art, and to a conscientious attempt to give tonal expression to poetical ideas of considerable dignity. The work was very well played, as were also the "Meistersinger" and "Wood Nymph" Overtures, and Max Bruch's Concerto in G (violin, Miss Barns).

THE members of the Somerset House Orchestral Society gave a successful "Ladies" Concert at Westminster Town Hall, on the 2nd ult. The orchestral numbers, including pieces by Gounod, Mozart, Haydn, Mendelssohn, and Wagner, were performed throughout in a highly creditable manner, under the conductorship of Mr. James Connah. Songs were contributed by Miss Evelyn Ogle and Mr. Griffiths-Percy, and instrumental soli were performed by Mdlle. Năwrik Nillăh (violin), Miss Grace B. Smith (pianoforte), and Mr. W. H. Meadway (cor anglais). A graceful Audae for solo violin and orchestra, from the pen of Mr. A. Gilbertson, a member of the Society, obtained a hearty reception.

MR. ALFRED E. IZARD, at his Concert in the Queen's (Small) Hall on April 26, submitted a novelty to the metropolis in a Sonata in C (Op. 50) for pianoforte and violin, by Professor Gernsheim. Whilst providing grateful work for both instruments, the Sonata cannot be said to be a very valuable addition to duo compositions, the general spirit of the three movements lacking the peculiar spontaneity that arrests attention. It is dedicated to M. E. Sauret, who, with Mr. Izard, gave it the best possible interpretation. These executants, with Mr. W. E. Whitehouse, were also heard in Beethoven's Trio in D (Op. 70, No. 1). There were solo instrumental performances, and Madame Clara Samuëll sang acceptably.

THE London County Council Bands, engaged to play in the parks and open spaces, before commencing their season of public performances had a rehearsal of the combined force (ninety-two players) at Drury Lane Theatre on the 15th ult. Overtures, operatic selections, and lighter pieces were rendered with point and precision; but throughout the afternoon no composition told better with the audience than Mr. Edward German's "Gipsy Suite of Characteristic Dances." The brightness, piquancy, and generally romantic charm of these refined effusions, effectively brought out by the band, were received with a warmth that augurs favourably for their popularity with the general public—equivalent, perhaps, to that already achieved by the Dances in the "Henry VIII." music.

THE Brixton Choral Society performed "The Redemption" to a crowded audience on April 29, at Brixton Hall. The soloists were Misses Kate Cove, Kate Smith, and Newman; Messrs. James Leyland and David Hughes, who discharged their respective duties with skill and judgment. Both the reflective and the dramatic choruses were sung with a feeling and spirit that could not but have extorted applause, even had the merits of the music been less. The orchestra was led by Mr. W. Frye Parker, Mr. F. W. Holloway was at the organ, and Mr. Douglas Redman again proved an efficient Conductor.

THE London County Council Musical Society, which boasts a male choir and an orchestra numbering together about ninety, gave a Concert, on the 9th ult., at St. Martin's Town Hall. The united force was engaged in Mr. Henry Gadsby's cantata "Columbus," a work deserving more attention from amateur associations. Mr. Harper Kearton sang the title-part, and Mr. J. W. Ivimey conducted. The miscellaneous pieces included part-songs and overtures; violin and harp solos, by Mr. Charles Cunningham and Miss Miriam Timothy respectively; and songs by Miss Gertrude Bevan and Mr. Ben Griffiths.

THE Madrigal Society celebrated its 154th anniversary at the Holborn Restaurant, on the 9th ult., when the Duke of Beaufort presided. After the usual loyal toasts the Chairman said he wished to mark an extraordinary occasion by presenting to Mr. J. E. Street, the secretary, an address and gold medal to mark the conclusion of the one hundredth year of office of the Street family as secretaries to the Society. A programme of madrigals was given, under the direction of Dr. Bridge, by the members of the Society, assisted by the children of the Chapel Royal and the boys of Christ Church, Lancaster Gate.

THE following Scholarships and Exhibitions will be competed for at Trinity College next month: The Queen Victoria Composition Scholarship, one Pianoforte Scholarship, and one Violin Scholarship, all tenable for three years; the Benedict Pianoforte Exhibition, Sims Reeves Vocal Exhibition, and one Exhibition in each of the subjects of organ, violin, viola, violoncello, and double-bass, all tenable for one year. These Scholarships and Exhibitions are open to all-comers under the regulations, and to-day (June 1) is the last day on which the names of candidates will be received.

THE International Music Trades' Exhibition will be held at the Royal Agricultural Hall, from the 13th to the 24th inst. Competitions have been arranged for violin, pianoforte, brass band; soprano, tenor, contralto, and baritone voices; and an organ recital competition. Particulars of the competitions may be obtained of the Secretary, The International Trade Exhibitions, Broad Street House; but we are asked to state that, with the exception of the vocal competitions, the entries are practically closed, and candidates for the vocal competitions should lose no time in entering their names.

THE Wickham Park Musical Society gave its third Concert, on April 29, at St. John's Church Room, New Cross, when Sullivan's "Golden Legend" was performed. The vocalists were Miss Pattie Hughes, Miss Jeanie Rankin, Mr. Charles Ellison, Mr. Frank Swinford, and Mr. T. Duckworth. The accompaniments were played on a pianoforte and harmonium, by permission of the composer, by Mr. T. E. Trotter and Mr. A. J. Sindall; and Mr. W. P. Rivers played the bells. The choruses were admirably rendered, under the direction of Mr. Frederick Tyler.

A WEALTHY resident in New York, Miss Nelson, has bestowed a considerable sum of money upon the establishment of schools for gratuitous musical instruction in the United States. Five institutions of the kind, provided with an efficient staff of teachers of pianoforte, violin, and singing, have already been opened, and the benevolent lady hopes that other capitalists will follow her example. Much, however, will depend upon the discrimination exercised by those in authority in order to render the undertaking a beneficial one to the community.

FOR the Leeds Festival the principals have now been chosen. These are Madame Albani, Miss Macintyre, Miss Medora Wilson, Miss Hilda Wilson, Madame McKenzie, Miss Sarah Berry, Mr. Edward Lloyd, Mr. Ben Davies, Mr. Andrew Black, Mr. Norman Salmond, Mr. David Bispham, and Mr. Watkin Mills. Mr. Sauer will be the solo pianist, and is to play Chopin's Concerto in E minor and Weber's Concertstück. It is announced that the work which Dr. Parry is writing for the Festival is an Ode to Purcell, libretto by Mr. Robert Bridges.

A MATINÉE Musicale was given at Brinsmead's Galleries, on April 29, by Herr Hermann Eissoldt. The artists who took part were Mesdames Carin Sjöquist, Elise Svendsen, Hilda Erskine, Wesson and Florence Rosenthal, Messrs G. Aspinall and Theodore France (vocalists), Miss Haselden (pianoforte), Miss Katherine O'Leary (violin), Miss Stella Balthasar (recitations). Mr. Ganz and Herr Eissoldt—who, by the way, was a pupil of Wieck and a friend of Schumann—accompanied, and several of the Concert-giver's compositions were performed with success.

THE Merchant Taylors' School Choral Society gave its twentieth annual Concert, on the 14th ult., in the large hall of the School, Charterhouse Square. The principal feature of the programme was Edmund Rogers's humorous cantata "Jack and the Beanstalk." The soli were sung by T. C. Hunt, P. Bunbury, Rev. F. G. Given-Wilson, and Mr. G. Thurgood. The chorus numbered about sixty voices and entered heartily into the humour of the work. Mr. E. G. Croager presided at the pianoforte, Mr. D. Bradfield at the harmonium, and the composer conducted.

SHAKESPEARIAN students will be interested to know that Mr. E. W. Naylor, son of Dr. Naylor, of York Cathedral, has in the press a book on "Shakespeare and Music," with illustrations from the music of the sixteenth and seventeenth centuries. The book includes an introductory chapter on music in social life during the sixteenth and seventeenth centuries, and historical explanations of a selection of representative passages from Shakespeare which deal with music. The work will be published by Messrs. J. M. Dent and Co.

VERY great improvements have been made in reed organs for concert or drawing-room purposes of late years, and some of these were being strikingly exemplified at the Matinée, given by Messrs. Metzler and Co., at the Princes' Hall, on Wednesday afternoon, the 8th ult. Mr. J. M.

Coward unquestionably gained some extraordinary effects from the instrument, particularly in his improvisation. Several esteemed artists, including Miss Fanny Davies, Madame Sapio, and Messrs. H. M. Higgs and David Bispham took part in the performance.

THE London Choral Union brought its first season to a close on April 30, at Queen's Hall, with a meritorious performance of "St. Paul." The choruses, particularly the vigorous "Stone him to death" and the inspiring "Rise up, arise," were very creditably rendered by the force conducted by Mr. J. W. Lewis, and not much fault could be found with the rendering of the orchestral portions. The principal solos were ably given by Madame Clara Samuelli, Miss Jessie King, Mr. John Probert, and Mr. Norman Salmond.

MR. J. F. BARNETT's cantata "The Wishing Bell" was performed on the 21st ult., at Holloway Hall, by students of the Marylebone Pupil Teachers' School. The choir of female voices, under the direction of Mr. Charles Tantram, gave a very meritorious rendering of the cantata, which met with a very hearty reception. The instrumental accompaniments were, in the absence of an orchestra, played on the pianoforte, harmonium, and harp—a combination which proved to be very effective.

MR. G. A. PARKER's annual Concert took place at the Birkbeck Institution, on the 18th ult., when he was assisted by Miss Ethel Winn, Miss Antoine, Mr. Tucker, Miss Hilda Parker, and Mr. Gerald Fitzgibbon. Miss Fanny Wentworth gave a musical sketch, and Mr. Charles Fry appeared with Miss Olive Kennett in two duologues. The members of the violin classes gave evidence of their careful training by Mr. Parker, who conducted. Mrs. Parker acted as accompanist.

THE Woodside Park Musical Society gave a Concert at the Woodside Hall, North Finchley, on April 30. The works performed were Spohr's "Last Judgment" and Gade's "Crusaders," the choral portions of which were carefully rendered by the choir, the solos being entrusted to Miss Niele Matthews, Miss Ingram Tucker, Mr. Herbert Weatherley, and Mr. Holden Walker. Miss Preston accompanied and Mr. Alfred J. Dye conducted.

ROSSINI's "Stabat Mater" and Mendelssohn's "Hymn of Praise" were performed by the Bermondsey Settlement Choral and Orchestral Union, on the 16th ult., at the Bermondsey Town Hall, under the direction of Mr. John E. Borland. The solo vocalists, Miss Kate Cove, Miss Evelyn Langdon, Mr. Lewis Thomas (who took the place of Mr. Braxton Smith), and Mr. Dan Price, together with chorus and orchestra, acquitted themselves admirably.

AT the Norwood and Streatham Literature, Science, and Art Society, on April 30, Mr. Charles Fry, assisted by Miss Olive Kennett, gave a Recital of the "Merchant of Venice," with Sir Arthur Sullivan's music. This was played by a small orchestra (led by Mr. Gatehouse), and a select choir also assisted. The Serenade was sung by Mr. J. T. Hutchinson, and the music was conducted by Mr. John E. West. The Recital was very successful.

HERR RICHTER gave his first Concert this season, on the 20th ult., at St. James's Hall, before a large and brilliant audience. The programme calls for no comment as all the works were familiar, but the manner of their performance was, perhaps, even finer than on previous occasions. The C minor Symphony, in particular, was played in an absolutely "inspired" way that stirred even those most familiar with the work and Herr Richter's reading of it.

THE projected performances, on the 11th, 13th, and 15th inst., at Bradford College, of "The Alcestis" of Euripides, in the original Greek, will undoubtedly be a memorable event to musicians, on account of the music written in Greek form by Mr. C. F. Abdy Williams. Every arrangement seems to have been made to ensure a reproduction of the conditions of the ancient Greek drama, and the result can scarcely fail to be extremely interesting.

IN connection with the Hobart (Tasmania) International Exhibition, Messrs. Challen and Son have received two special jury diplomas with the only gold medal for pianettes.

THE Streatham Choral Society must be commended for departing from the beaten track by reviving Sir G. A. Macfarren's Oratorio "St. John the Baptist," at the Concert at the local Town Hall, on the 6th ult. Mr. Stewart Macpherson, the Conductor of this enterprising body, had evidently taken pains to secure an adequate performance in every respect, and the result was eminently praiseworthy.

MR. SINCLAIR DUNN'S fifteenth annual Concert was successfully given at the Cavendish Rooms on the 1st ult. He was assisted by Mesdames Nina Moubot, Kate Fusselle, Susetta Fenn, Mildred Henfrey (pianoforte), and Emily Hardy (violin); Messrs. Frank Fleming, Hugo Heinz, and Master Willie Cooper. Messrs. W. G. Wood, L. Schlesinger, and Signor Fiori acted as accompanists.

AT the Gloucester Festival, which will be held on September 10 to 13, a new cantata, by Mr. F. H. Cowen, entitled "The Transfiguration," a Concerto for organ and orchestra, by Dr. C. H. Lloyd; a short Church cantata, "A Dedication," by Mr. Lee Williams; and a Fantaisie for pianoforte and orchestra, by Miss Rosalind Ellicott, will be produced.

ON the 20th ult. a new Society, called the St. Matthew's West Kensington Choral Society, gave its first Concert at Addison Hall, when it performed J. F. Barnett's cantata "Paradise and the Peri," conducted by Mr. Hedley Carus; the solo portions being entrusted to Miss Selina Quirk, Miss Alice Gough, Mr. Herbert Scott, and Mr. W. J. Morrell.

THE competition for the Erard Centenary Harp Scholarship, at the Royal Academy of Music, took place on the 3rd ult., at the Salle Erard. The scholarship was awarded to Annie Mary Hughes, and the Examiners highly commended Amalie A. E. Brousson and Ada E. Toms. Miss Hughes is a native of North Wales.

AT St. Peter's Church, Eaton Square, the cantata section of Mendelssohn's "Lobgesang" was sung as the anthem at the Ascension Day service. The Symphony was played as a concluding voluntary by Mr. W. de Manby Sergison, who presided at the organ throughout the service.

ON Ascension Day the sixteenth Oratorio Service (3rd series) took place in St. Matthew's Church, Denmark Hill, when Mendelssohn's "Hear my Prayer" and "Lauda Sion" were sung. Dr. Warriner presided as usual at the organ on each occasion.

THE pupils of Mr. Arthur O'Leary, at the Guildhall School of Music, have presented him with a handsomely fitted dressing bag, accompanied by an address expressive of their appreciation of his endeavours to further their musical progress.

THE directors of the Paris Grand Opéra are preparing for next winter a series of Concerts on a grand scale. In the first series there will be at least one British programme, and it is stated that this will include Sir A. C. Mackenzie's "Rose of Sharon."

IT is stated that M. Bruneau, the author of "L'Attaque du Moulin" and "La Réve," has completed a Requiem for soloists, choir, and orchestra, which will be produced for the first time by the Bach Choir Society early in 1896.

THE annual Dinner of the Royal College of Organists was held at the Holborn Restaurant, on the 6th ult., Sir A. C. Mackenzie, the president, in the chair.

OBITUARY.

WE have to record the death, on April 10, at Berlin, of Professor Dr. EMIL TAUBERT, an able philologist, and for many years attached in an official capacity to the Royal Theatre of Berlin. A son of the late distinguished musician, Wilhelm Taubert, for whom he wrote the libretto of an opera, "Cesario," the deceased, at an early period of his career, gained some distinction as an author and adapter of books for the lyric stage; a distinction to which, of recent years, he has added by his able revision of the poem to which Beethoven wedded his "Prometheus" music. Dr. Taubert occupied the position of Intendant at the Berlin Royal Theatre, and on the death, in 1888, of Titus Ullrich, was also appointed dramatic adviser to that institution. One of his last literary productions was the libretto of "Roland von Berlin," the music to which, by Signor Leoncavallo, and its realisation on the stage, remains at present problematical. The deceased was only fifty-one years of age.

EDOUARD NEVEJANS, a distinguished Belgian musician, died on the 2nd ult., at Brussels, aged fifty-three. He was the conductor, for a number of years, of the "Les Mélomanes" Choral Society, of Ghent, which, under his guidance, has become one of the leading choirs in Belgium; and for the last twenty-five years he held a vocal professorship at the Ghent Conservatoire. In the latter capacity, M. Nevejans succeeded in forming a number of excellent pupils, while introducing some salutary reforms into the teaching plan of the Institution. The deceased artist was the composer of an opera, "De Dubbele Jagt," as well as of numerous songs, and has earned the gratitude of music-lovers generally by rescuing from oblivion many of the old Flemish Volkslieder.

FRANÇOIS LINTERMANS, one of the most zealous promoters of choral singing in Belgium, died last month, at Brussels, at the advanced age of eighty-seven. Originally a chorister of the Paris Opéra during the stirring period of the première of "Robert le Diable," he became a successful and much esteemed teacher of singing, both in Paris and Brussels (his native town); and subsequently turning his attention to the cultivation of his art amongst the artisan class, he became the founder of the choral society known as "Les Artisans-Réunis." The latter for many years occupied the first rank amongst similar institutions in Belgium, a fact which met with due recognition when, in 1872, "Les Artisans-Réunis," at the expense of their ardent conductor, paid a visit to London, and some ten years later also to the Austrian capital. M. Lintermans has written some choral compositions, amongst which "Le Réveil" is perhaps the most widely known.

THE death is announced, on the 1st ult., at Vienna, of CARL VON OLSCHBAUR, for many years the highly respected president of the world-famed Viennese Männergesang-Verein. Gifted with a remarkably sweet and well-cultivated tenor voice, Olschbaur was, in his younger days, greatly in request as an amateur singer in the best Viennese circles, while his connection with the Männergesang-Verein dates back as far as the year 1846. In 1872 he was elected president of that Institution, and as such exercised a considerable influence upon its further development, accompanying it upon all its important concert-tours, and, while in every way advancing the interests of the Society, gaining for himself many well-earned distinctions from high quarters both at home and abroad. The deceased, who was a notary by profession, was in his sixty-seventh year.

WE have also to record the following deaths:—

On April 9, at Hirschberg (Silesia), THEODOR LEBRUN, for twenty years director of the Berlin Wallner Theater, aged sixty-seven.

On April 10, at Vienna, JOSEPH WEYL, author of librettos to numerous popular operettas, aged seventy-four.

On April 13, at St. Petersburg, WILHELM RAMSO, for many years first orchestral conductor at the Imperial French Theatre at St. Petersburg, a native of Denmark, aged fifty-eight.

On April 15, at Madrid, VICENTE CALTANAZAR y ARNAL, once a celebrated operatic singer, and for many years a highly-esteemed professor of dramatic singing and elocution at the National School of Madrid, aged eighty.

On April 23, at Berlin, JULIUS BUMKE, president of the German Allgemeine Musik Verband.

On April 27, at Trieste, ANTONIO TORESELLA, professor of singing, for many years director of the chorus at the Teatro Comunale, Trieste, and father of the well-known operatic singer, Fanny Torsella.

On April 28, at Stuttgart, Dr. FERDINAND SCHOLL, for many years director of the Stuttgart Conservatorium, and professor of musical history and æsthetics at that Institution, aged seventy-eight.

Recently, at Berlin, in St. Hedwig's Hospital, Cavaliere Professor GUSTAVO MAZZANTI, one of the foremost flute players of Italy, and professor of his instrument at the Conservatorio in Ferrara, aged thirty-five.

Recently, at Paris, by her own act, after a long and painful illness, Mdlle. JENNY MARIA, gifted authoress and pianist, whose concerts at the Salle Erard were much frequented.

On the 3rd ult., at Hamburg, FERDINAND NESMÜLLER, formerly theatrical manager, composer of several popular vaudevilles, aged seventy-three.

On the 5th ult., at Paris, LÉON REYNIER, distinguished violinist, pupil of Massart at the Conservatoire, and professor of his instrument, aged sixty.

On the 10th ult., at Darmstadt, OTTO HOHLFELD, brilliant violin player, and solo violinist of the Grand Ducal Orchestra, aged forty-one.

On the 9th ult., GEORGE LLOYD KEMPTON, aged twenty-five, son of Mr. Thomas Kempton, Vicar-Choral at St. Paul's Cathedral, for ten years in the service of Messrs. Novello, Ewer and Co.

On the 14th ult., at Liverpool Road, ELIZA WESLEY, aged seventy-six, daughter of Samuel Wesley, and sister to Samuel Sebastian Wesley.

On the 21st ult., at Manchester, B. ST. J. B. JOULE, Organist of St. Peter's Church in that city. He was the author of several works for church use that have become widely known, and acted as musical critic to the Manchester Courier from 1850 to 1870. He was born at Salford in 1817.

FRANZ VON SUPPÉ, the well-known composer of light operas, died at Vienna, on the 21st ult., in his seventy-fifth year. He was a nephew of Donizetti, and showed musical talent at a very early age. He produced a Mass, at Zara, in his fifteenth year. Settling in Vienna, he became conductor at various theatres there, and soon began to write for the stage. The number of his works is very great. He is best known in England by the pretty Overture to his "Poet and Peasant."

CORRESPONDENCE.

WESLEY'S "BLESSED BE THE GOD."

TO THE EDITOR OF "THE MUSICAL TIMES."

SIR,—Will you kindly insert in your next issue the enclosed letter, written by the late Dr. Wesley (about 1865) to Mr. Alderman Dyson, of Windsor, referring to his well-known anthem "Blessed be the God." The many admirers of Wesley's church music will, I am sure, feel indebted to Mr. Dyson for allowing me to publish this very interesting letter.—I am, Sir, yours truly, F. A. W. DOCKER.

St. Andrew's, Wells Street, W.

"Winchester.

"My dear Sir,

"You are so kind as to speak well of the anthem 'Blessed,' but I assure you I view it merely as a sort of shewy sketch, or a little thing just made to stop a gap, and never meant for publication. It may be something new in its style, and certainly is effective, but it does not satisfy me as to being true Church music. However, people all seem to like it, and perhaps it may lead people to look at better things of mine. I felt much obliged to you for getting it noticed at Windsor. I viewed Windsor as a place that would never do anything for me.

"I am,

"Yours very truly,

"S. S. WESLEY."

WIND INSTRUMENTS.

TO THE EDITOR OF "THE MUSICAL TIMES."

SIR,—Reading the paragraph (p. 306 in your May number) on wind instruments, I was reminded of a mot of Papa Haydn's, which showed the view of composers and consequently, also, that of the general public, with regard to compositions for, and performances by, wind instruments, and that at a time when wind instruments were particularly in favour.

A horn player, for whom Haydn had written some music, asked him one day: "'Herr Kapellmeister, why do you not put into the pieces you write for me some of those beautiful ideas that you put into your Symphonies?' Whereat Haydn replied, 'I shall take good care I don't' (Ich werde mich hüten)."—Yours truly,

ED. SACHS.

THE CANTICLES OF THE CHURCH.

TO THE EDITOR OF "THE MUSICAL TIMES."

SIR,—I should be glad to be informed by some ecclesiastical authority—doubtless there are many such among your readers—why the use of the "Jubilate Deo," "Cantate Domino," and "Deus Misereatur" seems to be now entirely tabooed in the services of the Church of England. Surely their occasional use would give variety to the services and would afford a fresh field to musical composers, settings of these Canticles being noticeable by their scarceness in your Parish Choir series, although the old Church composers frequently wrote music to them.—Yours faithfully,

AN ENQUIRER.

TO CORRESPONDENTS.

Notices of concerts, of which programmes must invariably be sent, and other information supplied by our friends in the country, must be forwarded as early as possible after the occurrence; otherwise they cannot be inserted.*

Our correspondents will oblige by writing all names as clearly as possible, as we cannot be responsible for any mistakes that may occur.

Correspondents are informed that their names and addresses must accompany all communications.

We cannot undertake to return offered contributions; the authors, therefore, will do well to retain copies.

Notice is sent to all subscribers whose payment (in advance) is exhausted. The paper will be discontinued where the Subscription is not renewed. We again remind those who are disappointed in obtaining back numbers that, although the music is always kept in stock, only a sufficient quantity of the rest of the paper is printed to supply the current sale.

H. DAVIES.—The Cantata you refer to is published by Messrs. Metzler and Co., Great Marlborough Street.

BRIEF SUMMARY OF COUNTRY NEWS.

We do not hold ourselves responsible for any opinions expressed in this summary, as all the notices are either collated from the local papers or supplied to us by correspondents.

BEDFORD.—On the 16th ult., in the Corn Exchange, a successful Concert was given, under the conductorship of Dr. H. A. Harding. The programme included Mendelssohn's "Son and Stranger" Overture and "Italian" Symphony, Nicolai's "Merry Wives of Windsor" Overture, and Grieg's "Peer Gynt" Suite, No. 1, all of which were effectively rendered by an orchestra numbering fifty-two performers. The vocalists were Madame Clara Samuelli and Miss Kathleen Walton. Mr. Gerald Walenn and Mr. Clement Hann contributed solos on their respective instruments, and Mr. H. Rose and Mr. Oliver O. Brooks-bank assisted in the accompaniments.

BRADFORD.—A series of five Recitals, given by Mr. J. Herbert England, the first of which took place on the 5th ult., has marked the re-opening of the remarkably fine four-manual organ, which has recently undergone extensive repairs, in St. Mary's Roman Catholic Church. Mr. England's programmes have presented a most comprehensive selection of organ music, well calculated to display the unusual capacities of the instrument.

BRIDGWATER.—The Amateur Choral Society, conducted by Mr. J. A. Barker, gave, last month, in the Town Hall, a successful Concert, the first part of which consisted of an effective performance of Mendelssohn's "Hymn of Praise." The soloists were Miss Julia Jones, Mrs. Bond, and Mr. W. Green. The orchestra was ably led by Mr. T. Carrington, and Mr. M. Rowe was an efficient pianoforte accompanist.

BUNGAY (SUFFOLK).—The Choral Society, conducted by Mr. Price, gave a praiseworthy performance, during last month, of Mendelssohn's "Hymn of Praise," the solo parts in which were rendered by Miss E. Ogle, Miss J. Hartcup, and Mr. Hennings. The instrumental portions were played by a small band, with Miss Adkin at the pianoforte.

CAMBRIDGE.—The seventh annual Concert of the Musical Union took place last month in the Guildhall. The work chosen was Handel's "Samson," the solos in which were entrusted to Miss Marjorie Eaton, Miss M. Johnson, Mr. W. Green, and Mr. J. Sandbrook. The choruses were sung in a manner that reflected much credit on the Conductor, Mr. W. T. See; a small band was ably led by Mr. R. H. Ingram, and Messrs. H. A. Bedwell and Mr. F. Bowman rendered valuable assistance at the pianoforte and harmonium.

CHARD.—On the 7th ult. the Harmonic Society closed its second season with an excellent performance of Handel's "Acis and Galatea" and Mendelssohn's "Lauda Sion," in the Corn Exchange. The soloists were Miss Marion Harris, Mr. Miller, Mr. Grant, and Mr. H. E. Small. Mr. A. Bennett led the orchestra; Mrs. J. Edis Tidman and Mr. A. Jeboult presided respectively at the pianoforte and organ; and Mr. J. Edis Tidman conducted.

COVENTRY.—The Co-operative Society's Choral Class gave a meritorious performance of Lahee's cantata "The Building of the Ship," with a miscellaneous selection for the second part of the Concert, on the 7th ult., in the Corn Exchange. The principals were Mrs. Hanson, Miss Florrie Cooper, Mr. S. Masters, and Mr. W. H. Ward. A capable orchestra was led by Mr. J. Baker, and Mr. F. W. Humberstone conducted.

CRIEFF.—Handel's "Messiah" was sung by the Musical Association, on the 14th ult., in the Porteous Hall. The soloists were Miss M. Finlay, Miss M. Fyfe, Mr. P. Kerr, and Mr. J. Fleming. Miss M. A. Clark presided at the pianoforte, Mr. D. M. Kellar at the harmonium, and Mr. A. Steven, to whose energy and skill much credit is due, conducted. The future progress of this new choral body will be watched with interest.

DOVER.—Sullivan's cantata "The Martyr of Antioch" was performed, for the first time here, on the 8th ult., in the Town Hall, by the Choral Union. The choruses were attacked with excellent precision, and the solos effectively sung by Miss McIntosh, Miss Greta Williams, Mr. Kelson Trueman, and Mr. Henry Sunman. A small orchestra was led by Mr. E. W. Barclay. Mr. F. E. Fletcher presided at the organ, Miss F. M. Gill at the pianoforte, and Mr. H. J. Taylor—to whom great praise is due—conducted. The work had a most favourable reception.

EYE.—The Musical Society gave a most praiseworthy performance of Mendelssohn's "Hymn of Praise" on the 2nd ult., in the Corn Hall, under the able conductorship of Mr. F. W. Bray. The soloists were Master E. Wood, Master G. Smart, Mr. H. L. Fulkerson, and the Rev. G. Hoare. In the miscellaneous second part pianoforte pieces were contributed by the Rev. C. W. James. The accompaniments were played by a small orchestra, with Mrs. Rix at the pianoforte.

FLEET.—An Organ Recital was given in All Saints' Church, by Mr. W. H. Bates, on the 14th ult. The programme included pieces by Mendelssohn, Carter, Lemmens, Bach, Wely, and Handel. The vocalist was Miss Ida Ouchterlony.

GRAVESEND.—The Gravesend and Milton Choral Association concluded its seventeenth season, on April 24, with a very creditable performance of Sir Arthur Sullivan's popular cantata "The Golden Legend." The principals engaged were Miss Kate Cove, Miss Greta Williams, Mr. Herbert Grover, and Mr. Harrison Brockbank, all of whom gave the greatest satisfaction. The choir gave good proof of careful training, and the performance reflected great credit upon Mr. Green, the Conductor. Mr. Alfred Burnett led the orchestra and Mr. Howard Moss presided at the harmonium. "The Golden Legend" was preceded by the Gipsy Suite of Dances by Edward German, the excellent performance of which, by the orchestra, delighted the large audience.

GREAT YARMOUTH.—The Concert given by the Meister Glee Singers on the 2nd ult., in the Theatre Royal, attracted a large audience. The popular gleemen were ably assisted by Madame Edith Goldsmith, who sang with much acceptance, and by Miss Angela Vanbrugh, who contributed several violin pieces with her usual success. Mr. B. Hulley was the accompanist.

HENDON.—An Organ Recital was given at St. Mary's Church, by Mr. R. W. Browne, on the 18th ult. The programme was interspersed with solos by Mr. Leonard Fowles (violin), Mr. F. de Paula (viola), and Mr. Hermann (violinello).

ILFRACOMBE.—The Choral Society, conducted by Mr. J. T. Gardner, gave a successful Orchestral and Vocal Concert, on the 7th ult., in Runnecleave Hall. The programme included Mendelssohn's "Italian" Symphony, Grieg's "Peer Gynt" Suite, Edward German's "Henry VIII." Dances, and a Minuet and Humorous Dance from "Narcissus," by the Conductor. Beethoven's Pianoforte Trio in B flat was played by Mrs. A. E. Wilshire, Miss F. Willis, and Mr. R. Salter; and the vocalists were Miss Annie Layton and Mr. G. K. Batten.

LLANIDLOES.—The Church Choral Society, now in its second year, gave a creditable performance of Dr. Gaul's cantata "Ruth," on the 1st ult., under the conductorship of Mr. Tom Phillips. The soloists were Miss Rose Long, Mrs. Roberts, Miss Marshall, and Mr. Heritage. A programme of a miscellaneous character followed, in which the soloists and the conductor took part. The accompanist was Miss Louie Ikin.

MARGATE.—The recently formed Philharmonic Society gave its first Concert, on the 22nd ult., to a large and enthusiastic audience, in the Assembly Rooms. The most important works in a high-class programme were the Overtures "Rienzi" (Wagner), "Mirella" (Gounod), Mendelssohn's Concerto in G minor, the Andante from Beethoven's "Kreutzer" Sonata, and a novelty in the form of a Symphonic Fantasia, by Mr. E. J. Bellerby, the Organist of Trinity Church. This gentleman, who conducted his own work—a meritorious composition—also gave an artistic rendering of the pianoforte part in the above Concerto. Mr. A. P. Howells was the solo violinist, and songs were contributed with much acceptance by Miss A. Sargent and Mr. F. R. Bevan. Mr. A. Thornton Bobby conducted.

MORECAMBE.—At the fifth annual Musical Competition held on April 27, in the People's Palace, prizes were awarded by Dr. A. H. Mann to the following competitors:—Masters Harold and Marcus Webster, Messrs. H. Whitaker and E. Illidge. Morecambe Madrigal Society (Conductor, Mr. Howson); Crosscraze Society (Conductor, Mr. Webster); Over Kellet (Conductor, Mr. Grossé); Hornby Musical Society—Blackburn Contest and Accrington Prize. Melling School Choir (Conductor, Mr. Hartley); St. Michael's-on-Wyre and Leek village church choirs, Morecambe Parish Church and Over Kellet church choirs. Male quartet parties: Nelson Excelsior, Burnley, and Leeds Lyric. The prizes were distributed by Mrs. North-North at a Concert given in the evening by the prize-winners.

OUNDE, NORTHAMPTONSHIRE.—Professor Villiers Stanford's choral ballad "The Revenge" and Mr. Waddington's clever setting of "John Gilpin" were given by the Choral Society, at its second Concert of the season, on the 8th ult. Both works were well performed, under the direction of Mr. M. Spurling.

OXFORD.—The annual Choral Festival of the Non-conformist Choir Union was celebrated in the Wesley Memorial Church, on April 24 and 25, when Mendelssohn's "Hymn of Praise" and some excerpts from the oratorios were effectively sung by about 150 voices. The solos were entrusted to Miss A. J. Ashley, Miss E. Pierce, and Mr. W. Davies. Mr. A. F. Kerry played the principal portion on the organ with skill, and Mr. H. E. W. Phillips conducted.

PAIGNTON.—Mr. A. G. Macey's Choral Society gave a successful performance of Mendelssohn's "Elijah," in the Public Hall, on the 8th ult. The principals were Mrs. Gibson, Mrs. M. Pask, Mr. D. Trotter, and Mr. S. J. Bishop. The well-trained choir, under the bâton of Mr. Macey, interpreted the choruses with admirable precision and intelligence, and were supported by a capable band led by Mr. Sponke.

PERTH.—Mr. Richardson's choir amply confirmed the good impression it has already made by its performance of Beethoven's "Mount of Olives" at its second Concert this season, on April 20. The Oratorio was given in St. Ninian's Cathedral, by the permission of the Dean, and the efforts of the chorus were materially assisted by a select orchestra under the leadership of Mr. Dambmann and conducted by Mr. F. S. Graves. The soloists were Madame Landsell and Messrs. Kennedy and T. Richardson. Mr. Collinson, Organist of St. Mary's Cathedral, Edinburgh, gave a fine rendering of a Bach Concerto. Barnett's "Ancient Mariner" was performed also last month by the Perth Musical Society.

PONTEFRAC.—The fine new organ recently erected in the Parish Church, by Mr. J. J. Binns, of Leeds, was opened on the 10th ult., when Mr. H. Fisher, the Organist, satisfactorily displayed the capacities of the instrument. The choir, augmented for the occasion, sang excerpts from the works of Haydn, Handel, and Mendelssohn with excellent effect.

RICHMOND.—Mendelssohn's 95th Psalm was sung by the choir at St. Luke's Church on April 30. The soloists were Masters A. Smith and E. Harper, and Messrs G. Bartlett and C. Pring. Mr. G. Percy subsequently sang Handel's "Honour and arms." The organ, played by Mr. M. A. Pattison, was supplemented by a small string band led by Mr. C. Cunningham, and Mr. Alfred Avery conducted.

TUNBRIDGE WELLS.—Mr. F. Hunnibell conducted, on the 15th ult., in the Great Hall, excellent performances of Rossini's "Stabat Mater" and Mendelssohn's "Hymn of Praise," which attracted a large audience. The solos were most effectively sung by Madame Amy Sherwin, Miss J. Rankin, Mr. Lloyd Chandos, and Mr. Sanford. Mr. H. D. Haarnack led a full orchestra, and Mr. C. H. Cronk presided at the organ.

WEST NORWOOD.—A successful performance of Bruce Steane's cantata "The Ascension" was given, on the 22nd ult., at the Public Hall, by the Norwood and District Choral Society, the band and chorus numbering 100 performers, under the conductorship of Mr. Lawrence Fryer. The solos were artistically rendered by Miss J. Thomson, Miss E. Appleyard, Mr. J. Probert, and Mr. G. Stubbs.

YEovil.—Great praise is due to Mr. J. A. Melborne, Organist of Holy Trinity Church, for the excellent Concert given by the church and auxiliary choirs, on the 8th ult., in the Town Hall. The programme consisted of selections from Handel's Oratorio "Judas Maccabæus," and the soloists included Madame Adolphy, Mrs. Hill, the Misses A. Manley, Slade, Puddy, and Lever; and Messrs. F. Plank, W. Walker, and Hannsell. The accompaniments were played by a small orchestra, and Mr. B. Swaffield rendered assistance at the pianoforte.

CHOIR APPOINTMENT.—Mr. Alfred J. Alderton (Bass), to Mr. Mary Abchurch, City.

ORGAN APPOINTMENTS.—Mr. W. H. Bates, Organist and Choirmaster to the Parish Church, Fleet, Hants.—Mr. H. W. Wheeler, Organist and Choirmaster to St. Anne's, Wandsworth.—Mr. John Archibald Hood, Organist and Choirmaster to the Wesleyan Chapel, Littleborough.—Mr. A. C. Eversfield, Organist and Choirmaster to St. Mary the Less, Kennington.—Mr. William H. Eaton, Organist and Choirmaster to the Parish Church (St. Edward's), Leek, Staffs.—Mr. Alfred G. Woodham, Organist and Choirmaster to Trinity Presbyterian Church, Kensington Park Road.—Mr. Alfred H. MACDONALD SMITH'S

Succinct application of KNOWN PHYSIOLOGICAL LAWS.
Ten minutes' healthy exercise daily ensures a success, otherwise quite unattainable save by the exceptionally gifted.

"Attracted so much attention of late in the musical world."—Musical Times, May, 1895.

PUPILS SAY:—

"Can play my old pieces without practising them up."

"What we have been seeking for eight generations."

"As great a discovery for the pianist as electricity was to commerce."

"Benefit already derived (after second lesson) nothing short of marvellous."

The Course of Six Lessons, personal or by post, Six and Three Guineas.

THE VIRGIL PRACTICE CLAVIER IN LONDON.

A TONELESS INSTRUMENT FOR TEACHING AND PRACTICE.
LIGHT, INEXPENSIVE, PORTABLE, DURABLE.

A necessity to Artists, Teachers, and Pupils.

In this Instrument mild clicks take the place of tones, and are far superior to tones in establishing an artistic execution and a musical touch.

THE EFFECT

Of the use of the Clavier is to make the touch accurate, firm, vigorous, elastic, sensitive, discriminative, delicate, enduring, and finished. It stops annoyance from piano practice, saves a good piano, and, rightly used, secures greater artistic playing skill in one year than can be acquired at the piano in three years, and frequently greater than is ever obtained at the piano.

Instruments Sold and Rented.

Send for descriptive Catalogue and professional opinions, or call and examine Instrument after June 1.

Address, THE VIRGIL PRACTICE CLAVIER,
64, Berners Street, Oxford Street, W.

FOR FESTIVAL OR GENERAL USE

BY

AUGUSTUS TOOP.

FOR VOICES IN UNISON

(With ad lib. Harmonised Parts)

BY

AUGUSTUS TOOP.

Price Fourpence.

"Musicianly in the refinement of its harmonisation; it is, in addition to this, endowed with agreeable melody."—Musical Standard February 16, 1895.

"The aim of the composer here has been to produce a Unison Service with some variety in the employment and mixture of the voices. He has succeeded admirably, the organ accompaniment playing a very important part in the composition of the music. We commend this bright and effective Evening Service to our choir-masters."—Musical News, January 12, 1895.

"This is a useful and very effective setting, and will prove most acceptable to choirs of moderate capabilities. Mr. Toop is a sound musician, and knows how to write music that is at once melodious and scholarly and at the same time not too difficult. This Service deserves every possible success, and will, doubtless, become very popular."—Musical Exchange Journal, April 17, 1895.

PREFACE.

This "Elementary Primer for the Pianoforte" aims at supplying "beginners" with a "Method" to be used from end to end in the order in which it is compiled.Although "Pianoforte Instructors" are as numerous as the sands of the sea, I claim for this one that it is quite original not only in its progressive order, but also in the language employed.Convinced that it is worse than useless to crowd a child's mind with words which, to that child, convey no meaning, I have studiously used only such words as a child with moderate intelligence can be expected to understand.The student must, before attempting to play, acquire a correct and unerring mental picture of the arrangement of the key-board.Counting aloud should become a habit from the very first finger-exercises.The customary "Household melodies" have been carefully avoided, because I confidently believe that, while engaged on a familiar melody, the student is unconsciously playing more or less "by ear," even correcting his own errors that way—instead of "reading" (deciphering) every note of the Piece.Diatonic Scales are not included. Till the student is sufficiently advanced to be taught the construction of major and minor scales, he is better without "scales" at all; and it does not come within the scope of an "Elementary Primer" to teach all that "the Scales" imply.Some Scale-passages, however, with no necessary tonality, are included.The so-called "English" fingering has been discarded in favour of the more universal "foreign" fingering.

WORDS AND MUSIC BY
HAMILTON CLARKE.

SUMMARY OF ARGUMENT.—The annual ceremony on the First of May, of the Installation of the Queen of the Daisy Chain, has been instituted by the Schoolmaster of the village, for the purpose of rewarding the most popular of the scholars in the girls' school. The celebration affords opportunity for an interesting display, and the author has woven into it a very ingenious and amusing plot, in which some of the most interesting characters are the Schoolmaster and Schoolmistress, a Ladies' Volunteer Ambulance Corps, commanded by Surgeon-Captain Amanda Chuckles, four other female and five male principal characters, with a chorus of schoolboys and girls. The scene is laid in the playground of the school.

THE ORGAN WORKS

J. F. BRIDGE, MUS. DOC., OXON., AND JAMES HIGGS, MUS. BAC., OXON.

IN this, the first complete English Edition of John Sebastian Bach's Organ Works (the Chorale Preludes excepted), the distribution of the parts between the hands is, in all doubtful cases, clearly indicated by the notes that are to be performed by the right hand being printed on the upper of the two manual staves, while the notes that are to be played by the left hand will be found on the lower of the two manual staves. As far as possible care has been taken not needlessly to divide a middle part between the two hands when it can be conveniently performed by one hand continuously. The text has been carefully collated with former Editions, but generally where it differs from Grienkerl's reading (Peters) it will be found to agree with the more recent Edition of the German Bach Society. Much thought has been given to secure convenient points for turning over, a matter of considerable importance to the performer. (See the "Great" G minor and the "St. Ann's" Fugues.) Suggestions as to the rate of performance and general treatment are given without encumbering the page with too detailed directions, and it is hoped the work in its complete form will be found a boon to the earnest Organ Student.

SINGING MASTER

CONTAINING

ADVICE TO THE MASTER AND STUDENT, EXERCISES, VOCALIZZI, &c.

By CHARLES SANTLEY.

PART I., PRICE FOUR SHILLINGS NET.

OPINIONS OF THE PRESS.

"Any words emanating from such a master of vocal art as Mr. Santley are worthy of consideration and the appearance of the first instalment of a Tutor from his pen must receive attention. Mr. Santley also gives hints to teachers, his instructions with respect to the blending of the registers are well worthy of note, as are the examples illustrating the difference between good and bad methods of vocalisation."—Athenæum.

"This is a capital work, and is worthy of the attention of the studios. The exercises comprised in the work are the basis of singing, and should be invaluable to those desirous of cultivating their vocal powers."—Civil Service Gazette.

"This new and valuable volume, which has just been published, is an excellent addition to the vocalist's library. The work is one which recommends itself to all who wish to study the art of vocalisation."—Times.

"Messrs. Chappell and Co. have just published the first part of 'Santley's Singing Master,' which contains a series of more than seventy admirably graduated vocal exercises, and a preface and an introduction in which the famous baritone gives much sensible advice to both teachers and students."—Manchester Guardian.

"This new Singing Tutor, by the greatest of English baritones, is most welcome, and students and teachers will find it an exceedingly valuable book. The instructions to masters and pupils will be found of great value to both. The handbook is comprehensive and cheap, and no doubt will receive the welcome it deserves on its merits."—The Freeman's Journal.

THE BEHNKE VOICE-TRAINING METHOD.

Price, in paper covers, Two Shillings; in cloth, Three Shillings.

VOICE-TRAINING PRIMER

By MRS. EMIL BEHNKE AND DR. CHARLES W. PEARCE.

An easy Catechism of Vocal Physiology and Musical Theory, for the use of Vocal Students generally. This work is also intended as a Text-book for preparing Candidates for Vocal Examinations, particularly those of the Associated Board of the R.C.M. and R.A.M., the Incorporated Society of Musicians, and Trinity College, London. It contains in one volume all the information required for answering the voir voce questions of Examiners.

Sixtieth Thousand. Price, in paper covers, One Shilling and Sixpence; in cloth, Three Shillings.

VOICE-TRAINING EXERCISES

In Six separate Books, for Soprano, Mezzo-Soprano, Contralto, Tenor, Baritone, and Bass.

By EMIL BEHNKE AND DR. CHARLES W. PEARCE.

"Admirable, and doubtless will prove of great utility."—Rev. Sir F. A. Gore Ouseley."Far more precise in plan than anything I have seen."—Sir R. P. Stewart."Scientific, systematic, and ingenious."—Sir John Stainer.

Third and Improved Edition. Price, in paper covers, One Shilling and Sixpence; in cloth, Three Shillings.

VOICE-TRAINING STUDIES

In Six separate Books, for Soprano, Mezzo-Soprano, Contralto, Tenor, Baritone, and Bass.

By EMIL BEHNKE AND DR. CHARLES W. PEARCE.

"This work contains 24 Progressive Studies in different styles, and is intended as a companion or supplementary volume to 'Voice-Training Exercises.' Those of a more cantabile character are to be used as Solfeggi, the others are to be sung as Vocalises. In this Second Edition the accompaniments have been simplified. Highly favourable opinions of these Studies have been expressed by Sir John Stainer, Sir Robert Stewart, Mr. W. H. Cummings, and other eminent authorities."

"There can be little doubt that these 'Studies,' which are published in separate keys for all voices, will share the popularity of the 'Exercises.'"—Sunday Times.

"We have no doubt that the second volume will equal the first in popularity."—Morning Post.

"I am glad to find you are still going ahead in your valuable sphere of work. The 'Voice-Training Studies' are a solid and sound contribution to the repertory of teachers and students."—Sir John Stainer.

"Your new book of 'Voice-Training Studies' is admirable, and will prove of very great value to students and teachers. I like it much."—C. Vincent, Mus. Doc.

MR. THURGATE SIMPSON (Tenor)

For Oratorios, Operatic Recitals, Ballad and Orchestral Concerts.
"THE MESSIAH," FREE TRADE HALL, MANCHESTER, MAY 11, 1895.—
"The principals were Madame Clara Samuel, Miss Sarah Berry, Mr.
Thurgate Simpson, and Mr. Bantock Pierpoint. The Choir and Band of Sir Charles Hallé were augmented by Mr. Lane's Philharmonic Society, numbering no fewer than 600. . . . Mr. Simpson was undoubtedly successful. His voice is pleasing in quality, and his delivery of the opening recitative, 'Comfort ye,' at once created a favourable impression, and this was confirmed by what followed. In the recita-tives and songs of the Passion music Mr. Simpson was heard at his best, and in this his restraint was specially commendable."—Manchester Guardian.

"Mr. Simpson sang with all the ease and style which only assiduous culture can bestow, and a full share of the honours which the principals received fell to him."—Manchester Courier.

Concert Parties arranged.

MR. JOSEPH HANSON

(TENOR)

(Of the Manchester, Leeds, and Blackpool Pier Concerts).

For Oratorios, Ballad Concerts, Operatic Recitals, &c.

The Preston Herald says:—"In Mr. Joseph Hanson the Choral Society secured an excellent tenor, whose robust voice was heard to great advantage in 'Comfort ye, every Valley,' 'The Passion Music,' and 'Thou shalt break them.'"The Accrington Advertiser says:—"It is questionable if the audience ever had a greater treat than the singing of 'The Indian Serenade,' by Mr. Joseph Hanson. He was simply magnificent; nothing could exceed the beauty and the tenderness of the lines. You could have heard a pin drop whilst Mr. Hanson was singing. The audience fairly seemed to hang on every word that fell from his clear, ringing tenor voice. And he sang so easily, so clearly, so melodiously, so pathetically. The last line of the song had scarcely died away when thunders of applause broke out. Mr. Hanson retired, and came on again and again. But it was no use. The audience would have it over again."

Care of Messrs. Forsyth Brothers, Manchester.

Agent—Farley Sinkins, 391, Oxford Street, London.

any of whom can be heard in London by appointment.

EXTRACTS FROM SOME RECENT TESTIMONIALS.

Geo. ROBERTSON, Sinclair, Esq., Organist, &c., Hereford Cathedral.—"Your boys are exceptionally good. They sing with much feeling and good taste, and are very reliable."—December 23, 1894.

Professor J. F. BRIDGE, Mus. Doc., Westminster Abbey.—"I have always found your boys sing well."—January 12, 1895.

Geo. G. BEALE, Esq., Mus. Bac., F.R.C.O., Llandaf Cathedral.—"I can only speak in the highest terms of the excellent tone and artistic renderings of your boys."—February 18, 1895.

Mr. Bates' boys have recently sung, in public performances, the solos of the following, and are prepared to sing any other works at short notice:—

Rossini's "Stabat Mater," Gounod's "Mors et Vita," "Redemption," "Gallia," "Messe Solennelle," "Faust" (Siebel); Mendelssohn's "Hymn of Praise," 13th, 42nd, and 90th Psalms, "Hear my Prayer," "Lauda Zion," Gaul's "Holy City," Stainer's "Daughter of Jairus," Schubert's "Song of Miriam," Costa's "Eli" (Samuel), Spohr's "God, Thou art great," "Last Judgment"; Handel's "Messiah," Bridge's "Cradle of Christ," Bennett's "May Queen," Barnett's "Ancient Mariner."

Critiques on most of the above works can be had upon application.

A DOUBLE-BASS FOR SOLOS, QUARTETS, &c., will be included with the above Artists.

CONDUCTOR AND PIANIST: MR. LAWRENCE HANRAY.

Mr. Hanray has conducted at Drury Lane and Principal London Oratorio Societies.

Suggested Programme for a FULL Ballad Concert.

Parts I. and II. could consist of VOCAL AND STRING QUARTETS, TRIOS, OR INSTRUMENTAL SOLOS, &c., AND BALLAD SCENAS, &c., accompanied with one or more STRINGS, OBLIGATOS, &c., SONGS, &c., the whole lasting from two to three hours.

Suggested Programme for Ballad and Opera (IN COSTUME) Concert

(which we found so great a novelty and success last season).

Part I. could consist of BALLADS, SCENAS, DUETS, STRING QUARTETS, TRIOS, VIOLIN SOLOS, &c., same as above, only lasting for about an hour and a quarter.

Part II. OPERA OR OPERETTA (in costume) ACCOMPANIED BY THE SIX INSTRUMENTAL ARTISTS, WHICH WOULD FORM AN ORCHESTRA.

Suggested Programme for Choral Society.

Part I. A small Oratorio Work with Chorus.

Part II. An Operetta in Costume, or the above party can be engaged for a whole work (Oratorio or Opera), or Opera in Costume or Recital.

IMPORTANT NOTICE.—By special arrangement the above Solo Instrumentalists would play in a work given by a Choral Society, or a Society can engage one or all the Instrumentalists, as well as one or all the Singers, for an Oratorio, or Recital of an Opera, thereby saving the travelling expenses of Instrumentalists coming from a distance.

RÉPERTOIRE.

JULY 1, 1895.

THE CONDUCTOR IN MUSIC.

THE need of an interpreter between composers and the public is sometimes made an occasion of remarks unfavourable to music as compared with the sister arts. We are told, and the assertion, of course, cannot be questioned, that poetry, painting, sculpture, and architecture make a direct appeal to observers, with no possibility of misrepresentation and no chance of failure save in so far as the public are incapable of appreciating what is addressed to them. That music labours under a disability in this respect must be admitted, but it is by no means certain that we should regard the position as wholly an evil. Indeed, looking at music as in great measure the expression of passing emotions—"scientific music" I now leave out of view—it seems to call for a highly trained and sensitive artistic organisation to act as a medium between itself and the less susceptible person who, unaided, might be unresponsive to its voice. This, however, by the way. My immediate purpose is not to discuss whatever advantage the art derives from its unique requirement, but rather to indicate certain attendant drawbacks, some of which are, at the present time, assuming proportions that call for anxious consideration.

In one of Matthew Arnold's early (and anonymous) poems, a "quietist" begins an address to a man of the world as thus:

"Why, when the World's great mind
Hath finally inclined,
Why," you say, Critias, "be debating still?
Why, with these mournful rhymes,
Learned in more languid climes,
Blame our activity,
Who, with such passionate will,
Are, what we mean to be?"

Assuredly it is never an agreeable, rarely a profitable, and scarcely, in the estimation of many, a sane task to remonstrate with the tendencies of the age, upon the stream of which it is so easy and pleasant to float towards an imagined haven of perfection, amid hymns of congratulation that Wisdom and Light are with us rather than with the cautious who "Linger shivering on the brink, And fear to launch away." In the experience of many others, however, the current setting towards highest good is rarely a broad stream upon which one can lazily ride without fear of bruises from obstacles. It is much more often a rock-encumbered brooklet, labouring its painful way, along which, if one would wade, he must be prepared for hard knocks. While no pessimist, I mistrust the smooth-flowing tides of human opinion. "Woe to you," says an authoritative Voice, "when all men speak well of you," and the scope of the warning can be indefinitely extended.

One of the strong currents of the hour runs towards freedom of musical interpretation, and upon it the cautious man must needs look with anxiety as to ultimate results. Here let me guard against possible misapprehension. It is not, I fancy, desired by any of us that "readings" of music should be mechanical and unmarked by the individuality of the reader. Nor, indeed, are such reproductions attainable without the aid of barrel-organs. Whenever the musical thought comes to us through a human being, it is inevitably affected by the medium. It is warm or cold, as he is warm or cold; it leaves us moved or unmoved, in some measure as he is moved or unmoved; and we recognise a gain or loss of its native power and beauty as he is capable or incapable of feeling and expressing those qualities. Hence, music performed for us necessarily comes clothed in greater or less degree, and to advantage or otherwise, with the personality of the performer. This is obviously in the nature of things, and cannot be otherwise. But here, as in so many cases, we must be prepared to see raised upon the natural fact a superstructure of licentious deduction. The tendency to extremes inevitably operates, and we now find that the medium who, conveying to us a composer's ideas, must needs give also a part of himself, is giving us all himself and only a part of the composer. To that, broadly speaking, have we come, and for it the evolution of the conductor is mainly accountable.

"The whole duty of a conductor," says Richard Wagner in his "Ueber das Dirigiren," "is comprised in his ability always to indicate the right tempo. . . . With good players the true tempo induces correct phrasing and expression, and conversely, with a conductor, the idea of appropriate phrasing and expression will induce the conception of the true tempo." The primitive conductor would have used the same words as to his "whole duty," had he written treatises, meaning, however, something very different from that which Wagner had in his mind. He honestly, good man, wished to hit upon the correct tempo, seeking it very often in tradition, that comfortable provision for the ease of persons holding his office; or trusting where he could to the deceptive metronome; or, failing these helps, getting as near as possible by guesswork to the composer's idea of Andante, Allegro, &c. At the worst, this exercise did not distress him. He saw no need for distress, well remembering the time when orchestras played great works without any conductor at all, quite to the satisfaction of the public. But, having determined the tempo of an overture or symphonic movement, he kept to it, unless the composer had otherwise directed, marching along with the regular step of a regiment on parade. That also was an easy and comfortable process. For the rest, he strove to keep his men in hand, to observe the p's and f's, as regards which, however, vague and various conceptions existed, and generally to follow the letter of the composition with reasonable exactness. This method was favoured by much of the music played—music which had, as a rule, broad and obvious significance, was clear and simple in construction and not guilty of meaning one thing when it appeared to say another. As for "readings," in the present sense of that word, the primitive conductor did not dream of them. There was the text, with the composer's indications for its rendering; why should he travel out of, or attempt to fill in, the record? Not that the conductor put this question to himself; the idea simply never occurred to him. With a correct and truly primitive instinct he loved to bring out the melody, to make it well heard and, if haply that might follow, well understood. Sometimes, as Wagner points out, the very naïveté of his methods led to most successful results, as when Habeneck (who "was not the medium of any abstract æsthetical inspiration" because "devoid of genius"), by rehearsing Beethoven's Ninth Symphony till every man in the orchestra knew and felt the melody when it came to his instrument, obtained a performance the beauty of which Wagner could not attempt to describe. The old conductor, with his traditions and his time-apparatus, has passed away. He served his day and generation like early editions of the "Encyclopædia Britannica" (which also have disappeared) and made room for new men as interpreters of new measures.

Reference has been made to the complicated structure of modern music, and it must be obvious that this, combined with the growth of the orchestra, has had much to do with the evolution of the modern conductor. I will not discuss the necessity of highly elaborated compositions, or the desirableness of big bands, further than to say that these are developments in harmony with the movement of the world at the present time, that they are with us and likely to remain, and that it is wisdom to make the best of them. In so far as the new conductor meets the necessity of the hour under these circumstances he does good and legitimate work. We could not get on without him, a fact which will be very clear to anyone who imagines the late Sir Michael Costa—perhaps the best conductor of the old school now in public memory—battling with the difficulties of a typical modern score, all the time under strong conviction that there is nothing like the Overture to "William Tell" or the Prelude to "Semiramide." Sooth to say, it is an illustration of a universal experience that we are witnessing—the hour strikes and the man of the hour presents himself. And what is the man of the hour like? Well, we have all seen him many times, and ought to know, only that he is Protean, and under some aspects disposed to the doing of things which puzzle us by their lack of necessity and their excess of gratuitous daring. When not in the mood for these achievements, he is a man equipped with minute knowledge of the work in hand, one who has studied the composer with lively perceptiveness, kept within due bounds by sober judgment and a spirit of reverence; who does nothing without reasons having their base, not in his own fancy, but in the text before him; who is as well acquainted with the means through which he works as with the end he seeks, knowing intimately the strength and weakness of every instrument in his orchestra, and that not entirely by observation, but through experience. Finally, he is master in his own domain, ruling absolutely, not by force, but by the cheerfully acknowledged right of the aristos. This man, in the height and depth, the breadth and length of his special knowledge and skill, and in the completeness of his power, is entirely a product of late times, before which circumstances did not call for him. If I be asked to name a chef d'orchestre answering the description just given, I instantly reply, "Hans Richter"—the modern conductor who, in my judgment, is the most completely equipped of all his kind, and the least addicted to excess of any sort. We who have studied our Richter know to some extent his perfectly balanced qualities of head and heart, of judgment and sympathy, and how, with him, the strong and natural impulses of an artistic nature are regulated by a powerful and enlightened will. This, united to complete and definite knowledge, and the faculty of command which ensures cheerful obedience from subordinates, accounts for the broad and dignified "readings" which masterpieces obtain at Richter's hands—readings never to be challenged on the score of irreverence, or accounted as other than the expression of convictions formed in the pure light of art. Such a conductor is equal to the needs of the modern situation. We ask for nothing more; but there are conductors who tender more, and it is these who now come up for observation.

The fact that the most famous chefs d'orchestre now living are what is termed "Wagnerian" conductors may be due to more than one cause. There is, for instance, the special character of Wagner's orchestral music—that curious mosaic in which, if the general design is to be faithfully reproduced, every detail necessarily receives particular attention. In its case, the whole effect depends upon the conductor, who alone—if haply he hold a key at all—holds the key to its meaning, and also the power to turn it in the lock. I can imagine nothing more conducive to mastery of the general through comprehension of the particular than the intricate scores of Wagner. They form an admirable training-ground for the modern chef d'orchestre, who needs the eyes of Argus and the hands of Briareus. But there may be another power working, for good or ill, in the training of a Wagnerian conductor, and that is the teaching of Wagner himself. In his unspeakably venomous and vituperative, yet always clever and often reasonable essay on "Conducting," the Bayreuth musician showed to his contemporaries and successors a way safe enough for himself, perhaps, but extremely dangerous for most of them. Let the reader turn to page 50 in Mr. Dannreuther's translation of "Ueber das Dirigiren," and attentively consider the author's remarks upon what he deems the proper rendering of the Overture to "Der Freischütz." Whether Wagner be right or wrong in this case is beside the present purpose, but I may be forgiven for pointing out that Siegfried Wagner's universally condemned reading of Weber's Prelude at a recent Queen's Hall Concert was, as near as he could get it, that of his famous father. But whatever may be said as to Wagner's own reading of the "Freischütz" Overture, the conductors over whom he had influence naturally and inevitably found their cue there. It, with other pages in the same treatise, is their charter of freedom—freedom to take any standard work and manipulate it at their pleasure, which, in many cases, as in that of Weber's Prelude, is to divide the piece into sections and determine a reading of each independently of the general purport and spirit of the composition. I say nothing of Wagner, who stands apart, but there is in me a very positive opinion that exceedingly few conductors are qualified thus to deal with a masterpiece of their art, and that many disastrous consequences must follow from encouraging them to act à la Wagner. Indeed, we have already experimental knowledge of such consequences in the finicking, over-wrought readings of parts taken by and for themselves, and the neglect of what has just been styled "general purport and spirit." It may be asked, "What, then, is a conductor to do under present circumstances?" I answer that he should avoid reading into his composer's subjects anything which is simply the product of his own fancy, anything that he cannot show beyond cavil to have support in the author's obvious intentions. At the same time, he should not, without reasonable warrant, ignore renderings which have long enjoyed the sanction of experts and the acceptance of the public. It was Wagner's cue to speak scornfully of traditional interpretations (before going at them with a pole-axe), and that master's example has not been without effect upon his disciples; yet must we, as reasonable men, ask ourselves whether long and general usage may not, after all, have its value. Custom, I know, has been called "the law of fools," and that is true when men blindly follow it; but I am not dealing with extremes one way or the other. What is it that some ask us to reject but the cumulative experience of generations and the deductions reasonably arising therefrom? We may be wiser than our forefathers—it would be a poor compliment to them to think otherwise, seeing we have the advantage of their labours—but they were not all fools, and they are the majority. We do not submit unquestioningly to their decisions, nor do the sensible among us scout them as effete. This applies to music as to other things, and the conductor who approaches a symphony or an overture bent upon disregarding the traditions of its rendering is an exceedingly foolish person. Others are simply weak. They dread the term "conventional," so much power, though not the power of reason, is there in a word.

I now pass to the consideration of another point. Eminent conductors are being played off one against another in the field of enterprising interpretations. This became inevitable as soon as the chef d'orchestre lifted himself, or was forced up by others, from the position of a student-translator, hidden as much as possible behind the work interpreted, into the position, almost, of a creative artist. As prime donne are rivals, so now are conductors rivals, and as each "first woman" seeks to out-shine her colleagues, so does the conductor, impelled by the exigencies of his position, try, as the vulgar phrase is, to "go one better" than others. In this he is supported by a curious and not very thoughtful public, who delight in something new, and are little concerned as to its character or tendency. So far, perhaps, small harm has been done, but we see no guarantees against mischief in the near future. Circumstances have greatly changed of late. Not so very long ago, a chef d'orchestre would settle down as Smetana did in Prague, and there remain, confining his labours to the city of his choice, and no more thinking of a starring tour than of a journey to Jupiter. Like a solitary chanticleer in a remote farm-yard, he had no contiguous rival to crow against, no provocation to the "one better." But the conductor of the time now present goes on tour like a tenor, and is much more in evidence than the music for which some old-fashioned folk suppose him to exist. He is "run after" as though he were a popular pianist and watched with equal interest through the round of his gestures and the variety of his attitudes. I appeal to men of experience and common sense as regards the danger involved in all this. Conductors, as far as we know them, are no more free from the weaknesses of humanity than other people, and we may expect to see extravagance follow on extravagance in the struggle for popular recognition. Unhappily, the state of public taste favours this result. Given a really musical community, the conductor travelling beyond his record would soon be challenged and rebuked. But, alas, we are not, by many weary leagues, a musical community.

I submit the foregoing remarks to the sober judgment of thoughtful amateurs—it is useless to appeal elsewhere—and I warn all musicians that there is danger ahead for the masterpieces of our art. "What is the use?" exclaims the pessimist, "nobody cares for your masterpieces; nobody respects authority; nobody acknowledges restraint." If that be true, there is no hope for the present generation, and all who think with me must put faith in the inevitable reaction, and trust in the justice of one seemed to know anything about his movements. The composer of "Hänsel und Gretel" does not like being lionised, and, therefore, sent no herald to announce his arrival. Monday came, and still no news of him. But his "Pilgerfahrt nach Kevlaar" was to be rehearsed on the following morning and performed in the evening; he was therefore bound to put in an early appearance. In the course of the afternoon I met Mr. E. van der Straeten, the violoncellist, and knowing that he was on the future, albeit Shakespeare makes his Henry IV. exclaim:

O, if this were seen,
The happiest youth—viewing his progress through,
What perils past, what crosses to ensue,
Would shut the book, and sit him down and die.

Whatever our prospective views may be, we shall not do this. The world, like Bunyan's Pilgrim, goes through the Slough of Despond and into Doubting Castle, but is ever nearer the Celestial City.

JOSEPH BENNETT.

AN INTERVIEW WITH HUMPERDINCK AT COLOGNE.

(BY OUR SPECIAL CORRESPONDENT).

ON Sunday (the 2nd ult.), the first day of the Lower Rhenish Festival, everyone was asking "Has Humperdinck arrived?" No one, however, had seen anything of him; and, further, no intimate terms with the composer, I made enquiry of him. He, too, was quite in the dark. But he suggested that we should call on Dr. Wette, the husband of Humperdinck's talented sister, the authoress of the libretto of "Hänsel und Gretel," and see if we could glean any information. Dr. Wette's second daughter received us, informed us that Humperdinck and his wife had just arrived, and asked us in. It was somewhat bold thus to break in on a family gathering, but we met with a cordial reception, and were asked to sit down and join the family coffee-party; Frau Wette was there, surrounded by her children. Humperdinck at once remembered having seen me before; we had, in fact, met at the Beethoven Festival, Bonn, in the previous year, though only for a few minutes. I was fortunate enough to see much more of him this time—I may well say fortunate, for even to get to speak to him is no easy matter. I asked Humperdinck about his Italian trip. He told me that he had just returned, and from his conversation he had evidently much enjoyed himself. He admires the Romans; with the Neapolitans, however, it is otherwise; in the former he finds traces of that nobility which distinguished their ancestors. After chatting for a time, he rose and walked about the room. Then he stood door nearest to the platform, and as he walked through the big Gürzenich hall, right to the back seats, many eyes were turned towards him, and many ineffectual attempts were made to get at him. On his left sat a young man who has lately been much talked about in Germany. This was Max Schillings, composer of "Ingwelde," a three-act music-drama, produced with immense success some months back by Herr Felix Mottl at Carlsruhe. Herr Arthur Smolian has declared that it furnishes before the pianoforte, and put his fingers on the keyboard, striking in the bass register a third inversion of a chord of dominant ninth, following it by an arpeggio first inversion of tonic chord. I hoped it was only a prelude, but, and, apparently, deep in thought, he moved away from the instrument, and, indeed, out of the room. He, however, soon returned, and showed us some interesting "Hänsel und Gretel" photographs. The dramatis personæ were none other than his charming little nieces. Above are two of the pictures, the situations of which will be at once recognised.

Humperdinck's wife, by the way, is a bright, energetic little woman, and it was quite evident, from certain remarks which she made, that she is her husband's man of business. My next meeting with the composer was at the rehearsal next morning. He was standing by the entrance an answer in the affirmative to the question whether Wagner has left a "school." I was seated on Humperdinck's right. It was interesting to watch his countenance during the rehearsal of his work; he was evidently listening most attentively. At such moments one cannot speak to a composer. When the morning rehearsal was over, he said that he must go and see Dr. Wüllner respecting one or two points in the performance of his work; he, however, soon returned and then I was with him for some time. He spoke about England, and said he thought his "Pilgerfahrt nach Kevlaar" would suit the English, and I hastened to assure him that I was of the same opinion. It is, in fact, a charming little work. From the vocal score one gets but little idea of the music; the characteristic colouring—for Humperdinck is a master of orchestration—greatly enhances the effect. The success of his opera in England appeared to afford the composer great satisfaction. But what has not met his approval are the premature reports which have appeared in the papers concerning the music which he has furnished for "Schneewittchen." In answer to the question why he did not finish a Symphony which he has had for a long time in his portfolio, he replied that, for the moment, he was occupied with some songs and choruses for "Die Königskinder," a play written by his sister.

My next meeting with Humperdinck was in the evening after the Concert. His cantata had been performed with brilliant success; at the close, indeed, he was summoned to the platform, and received an enthusiastic ovation. The composer is not spoilt by success; he seems to accept it as a necessary evil accompanying greatness. After the concert he was quite as simple and genial as before. I had arranged to see him, but just as I was approaching, the worthy Herr Degen, Amtsgerichtsrath of Bonn, came up to me, and with vasty voice, said: "There is only one Beethoven, and Wüllner is his Prophet."

This was the closing sentence of a short speech made by M. Vincent d'Indy, the French composer, at a gathering in honour of Dr. Wüllner after the Beethoven Festival at Bonn last year. These were Herr Degen's farewell words to me when I went to take leave of him on quitting Bonn. After thus reminding me of pleasant days in the past, he turned to Humperdinck, and for a moment the life of the composer appeared in danger. The worthy Councillor Degen is of Falstaffian proportions, and was so overjoyed at meeting his old friend that he clasped him tightly in his arms; it seemed as if Humperdinck, who is not a man of big stature, would be killed by the kindness and enthusiasm of the greeting. But he emerged from the embrace unharmed, and I was able to congratulate him on the success of his work. I ventured to remark, however, that it had one fault—namely, that of being over-brief. With a twinkle in his eye, he assured me he thought that no fault, but rather an advantage.

I was to see him the next morning, but there is often a slip between the appointment and the meeting; business elsewhere necessitated, as I found on consulting the time tables, an earlier departure from Cologne than I had anticipated, and I saw no more of the composer of "Hänsel und Gretel."

FROM MY STUDY.

JULIE DORUS GRAS, whose portrait is now before the reader, was born at Valenciennes in 1807, her father being conductor of the orchestra in the theatre there. This gentleman's name was Steenkiste. He had been a soldier, but probably found himself more comfortable in the peaceful pursuit of music. At any rate, he put himself beyond the reach of war's alarms, as far as was possible in those days, and met with more success in the orchestra than he could have hoped for on the field of battle. Steenkiste had two children, both of whom reached eminence in their several ways. One, a boy, became famous as a flautist; the other was our heroine. They worked under different names. Young Steenkiste kept his patronymic, the non-euphonic character of which led to the adoption, by his sister, of their mother's name, Dorus, and as Mdle. Dorus, Julie appeared at a concert in her native town, she being then in her fourteenth year. At that time the municipality of Valenciennes contained, strange to say, some discerning and liberal men, possessed of the enlarged sense of duty which takes in more than the town pump. These persuaded their colleagues, and, not having the fear of discontented ratepayers before their eyes, the urban council adopted little Julie, sending her to the Paris Conservatoire for three years, with an annual allowance of 1,500 francs. She entered in December, 1821, had lessons from Blangini, and in 1822 won a first prize for singing. Paër and Bordogni next took her in hand, and completed her academical training. It is worth while adding, as an instance of gratitude, that the young student sent the wreath received as "first prize" from the hands of Cherubini to the municipality which had made possible its acquisition. It should also be noted that, while yet a student, Paër obtained her appointment as chamber-singer to the king.

Leaving the Conservatoire in 1825, Mdle. Dorus went on an extended concert tour, and in due time reached Brussels, where her brilliant voice and facile execution attracted the notice of the Royal Intendant, who invited her to accept an engagement for the opera. She had theretofore made no studies for the position, but six months of hard work enabled her to appear at the Monnaie with great success. In 1830 the young artist accepted an engagement in Paris, and at once entered upon the most brilliant period of her career, making her first appearance in Rossini's "Le Comte Ory." She is described as being then equally agreeable in person and voice. "She was of middle stature, light and graceful in form, and exceedingly pretty, with blue eyes and blonde hair. Her voice was thoroughly French, possessing all the beauties and all the defects of the school to which she belonged. Its compass was two octaves (from D to D), but the tone was weak in the lower notes; in the high notes, on the contrary, her voice gained volume, penetrating power, and extraordinary brilliancy." At this period, too, Escudier wrote: "She shines above all in fioriture and the ornaments of vocalisation. Passages the most eccentric, caprices the most varied, roulades the most daring, offer no obstacle to the marvellous facility of her throat. Mdlle. Dorus is remarkable also for the brilliance and vigour of her singing. Her voice, of perfect intonation, seizes each note with certainty and surprising firmness." The success of an artist thus qualified, even in the fastidious and musically pampered Paris of 1830, could not be in doubt. Certain defects were by no means in her way. Her voice was to some extent "throaty," but that was French; she paid very little heed to her words, but words were not

"Robert le Diable." She was also the original Page in Auber's "Gustave"—a work superseded later by Verdi's "Ballo in Maschera." After successes like these, the artist's appearance in London was only a question of time, and a very short time. Mdlle. Dorus, accompanied by her brother, the flautist, came to England in 1839, and began here as a concert singer, afterwards making a tour in the provinces with Tamburini and others. Some time elapsed before her second visit, and, truth regarded on the lyric stage, and a melody was, to her, a string upon which to hang the flowers of vocalisation, while her exaggerations gave "art circles" something to talk about, as when they said that, with Dorus on a high note, one might go to a café, eat an ice, and be back before she had quitted it.

No long time elapsed before Mdlle. Dorus rose to the top of the tree, taking the leading parts in such works as "La Muette" ("Masaniello") and "Guillaume Tell." To her, moreover, was assigned the honour of "creating" the heroine in "Le Philtre" and to tell, Mdlle. Dorus just then passed through a crisis in her career—one which led to her retirement from the French stage in 1845. A rival had sprung up in the person of Madame Stoltz, and the fickle Parisians turned easily, no doubt gladly, from the old love to the new. Because of this, perhaps, Mdlle. Dorus cultivated London, paying us almost annual visits, and at length appearing on the lyric stage as a member of the company got together by Jullien for his disastrous attempt at carrying on Italian Opera. Although ignorant of English, she played in an Anglicised version of "Lucia," with Mr. Sims Reeves and the late Mr. Weiss as colleagues. She was much liked, it is said, "for her easy, graceful style and her brilliant singing, in spite of the perceptible defects of her English pronunciation; but she either could not or would not learn another libretto, and was obliged to withdraw." In 1849 she accepted an engagement at the Royal Italian Opera, playing some of her Parisian rôles, but failing, somehow, to create enthusiasm. This she must have felt, for Mdlle. Dorus—or Madame Dorus Gras, as she was called after was once considered the rival of Beethoven. Starting with the advantage of Mozart's teaching, Hummel certainly had a brilliant career, but we are all now pretty much of the mind of Mr. Dannreuther when he says: "Endowed with curiously little inventive power, rarely warm, and quite incapable of humour or of passion, but fully equipped with every virtue that can be acquired by steady plodding, he appears expressly cut out for the hero of respectable mediocrity."

I apprehend that not every reader of THE

her marriage, in 1833, to a violinist of the Paris Opéra—came no more to this country. Her career had, in fact, ended, only an occasional concert being favoured with her assistance.

Johann Nepomuk Hummel, whose portrait accompanies that of Madame Dorus Gras, is too well known for a biographical sketch here. Enough that he was a native of Pressburg, that he was born in 1778 and died in 1837. Mr. Edward Dannreuther, writing in Grove's Dictionary, calls him a "dull classic," and seeing how completely his works have vanished from active life it seems hard to believe that he MUSICAL TIMES is lucky enough to possess a complete set of Punch, and this led me, when looking through a far-back volume of the Sage of St. Bride's, to consider whether there might not be both entertainment and instruction in some occasional extracts from his store of wisdom and mirth. I now put the matter to a practical test, and shall be guided by the result.

Volume II., issued fifty-three years ago, is sufficiently remote, as the world now moves, for the interest of ancient history, and turning over its leaves I come upon a page of verse, which Mr. Punch's poet recommends as "Norma Made Easy." Opera in English was played to Londoners then by such artists as Miss Kemble, Miss Rainforth, and Mr. Harrison, with whom the poet, I rejoice to say, does not make so free as with rhyme when he couples "stormer" and "Norma." The learned and ingenious Dr. Pegg, could he come to life again, would probably argue that this Cockneyism is quite right and can be traced to high classical authority. But Dr. Pegg is dead—a fact of which I will not take a mean advantage, and so pass on to the poet's description of the last Finale in "Norma." The Priestess assails her recreant lover, Pollio—

Right and left he comes in for it—really, Miss Kemble
Is enough to make poor Mr. Harrison tremble,
And then, on the other hand, charming Miss Rainforth
In accents contemptuous pours her disdain forth;
He tries to assuage her, to nothing she'll listen,
With lightning the eyes of Miss K. seem to glisten;
Miss R. turns in horror and scorn from his side,
And tells him to stick to his termagant bride;
And the fate of poor Harrison seems quite uncertain,
When, lucky for him, they let down the act curtain,
And, presto, in lieu of the Druids, we hear,
"Apples, oranges, bill of the play, ginger beer."

Mr. Punch soon passes from rhymed criticism to criticism in prose, and lays violent hands upon Mercadante's "Elena Uberti." I extract one passage, which somewhat anticipates the "new critic" of 1895: "To the learned in the works of the best operatic writers, a 'grand tragic opera' by Mercadante, Donizetti, or Pacini, must suggest the idea of a symphony of Beethoven played upon a German flute, or a Weber overture arranged for a one-handed accordion." Silly extravagance, but Punch does not pretend to seriousness and hard facts, wherein he has an advantage over some of those whose criticism he anticipated. Madame Vestris produced, in 1842, the "Marriage of Figaro" as Mozart left it to us, and Mr. Punch's prose critic is fittingly appreciative. Not long before, he states, that opera had been "not altogether solemnised on the English stage" in the form of "a hash dished up by its concoctors to introduce the ballads of a native composer, a duet by Paesello, a chorus or two of Rossini, and in which a compliment was paid to Mozart and the taste of British audiences, by adding four, or, at most, five, of that great master's pieces." For superseding this awful mess by the genuine article, Madame Vestris is properly praised, while, as for the performance the critic tells the truth, no doubt, and saves himself trouble by a comprehensive and highly professional utterance: "Every performer, from the hero, by Leffler, down to the drunken gardener, by Horncastle, appears to possess, at least, a full appreciation of his author, and to enjoy, as well as to sing, the music. This being the case, it would be invidious to select any one of them for remark." Of course it would, and the critic, laying down the pen, takes up his glass.

An enthusiastic audience assembled to hear Persiani, and were met by a communication from Wardrop, M.D. "Madame Persiani," said Wardrop, "continues to suffer so severely from the effects of sea sickness, accompanied with violent retching, that it is impossible for her to appear this evening"; whereupon a reasonable, though disappointed, British public showed many signs of dissatisfaction. Punch comments: "The audience were perfectly right. In the first place, Persiani, being considered on all hands a perfect syren, must have been so used to the vicissitudes of the ocean that sea sickness was utterly impossible. We should as soon think of a butterfly dying of ossification of the heart. Secondly, all the bargains of all singers, foreign and native, prove their utter want of bowels; hence the retching must have been clearly an Esculapian fallacy—a gratuitous benevolence of Wardrop, M.D." We now come to the dissatisfaction of an enlightened British public. "The audience were justified in becoming very savage at the violent retching of a sea-sick St. Cecilia, and had she had the effrontery to die, they would, we are convinced, have been perfectly exonerated, by all the laws of English freedom, in breaking the chandeliers and tearing up the benches."

"The Ancient Concerts," says one of Mr. Punch's youths, "are supposed to be thus named after the style of the audiences that attend them, as well as from the exhumations which take place there. In the taste for reviving long-forgotten subjects, we are promised some selections from the works of Orpheus, and an undoubted symphony of King David; a mélange from the celebrated opera of Virgil, familiar to every scholar, may be confidently looked for before the conclusion of the series." This is rather poor, and, no doubt, Mr. Punch told his young man to "go down one."

Doubtless from the great Sage himself came the suggestion for a British Composer's Art Union. There had been a season of opera at Drury Lane in aid of the movement "to establish upon the English stage the works of the greatest composers of the English school of music," and the following works had been produced: "Acis and Galatea," "No Song no Supper," described by Punch as containing the most unblushing pilferings of one Italian from another; "The Poor Soldier," "consisting," remarks the same authority, "of Irish melodies put together very badly by Shield," and one real English piece, by a Mr. Rodwell, condemned as "an effort of ignorance and memory." The retrospect made Mr. Punch very angry, and hence the hint of a Musical Art Union.

I am naturally much interested in the fact that Punch, in his character of universal anticipator, laboured at the present-day task of THE MUSICAL TIMES, and administered kindly correction to incompetent musical reporters. Referring to a periodical which he calls The Theatrical Record, and moved by the beauty of its style as well as its freedom from grammatical trammels, he makes several extracts from its pages. One of these I reproduce for its curious similarity to passages of more modern date often to be seen pilloried in these columns:

"Of the gems of this sublime opera ("Semi-ramide") we must particularly direct attention to Mrs. Alfred Shaw's manner and divinely expressive way of singing her cavatina, 'Ah, that day I well remember,' where her sublime contralto, controlled by the most scientific skill, and whose soft diapason tones fall like seraph's harmony, and penetrate the heart with chastening ardour and inspiring effect. Again the contralto and soprano duet, 'Dark day of sorrow,' between Miss Kemble and Mrs. Shaw; what deep pathos! what eloquence discoursing! Mark the clear, brilliant, towering sublimity of expression as Semiramide holds on the C in alt, while the thirds and fifths of Assuca's (sic) deep mellow notes from D to G in a full octave and a half are filling in a sublime harmony of melody of the most touching and refined order." The last sentence will strike despair into the hearts of the writer's successors.

In his third volume Mr. Punch "lies low" as regards music. He had, perhaps, sent his young men to their studies in the art, but a little later they will be found active enough, and showing sport in fine style. X.

MUSIC IN DANTE'S "DIVINE COMEDY."

It has been well said that the study of Dante is a liberal education. There is, in truth, scarcely any subject of interest left untouched by the transfiguring power of that master-hand. Theologian, philosopher, poet, statesman, historian, man of science, painter, sculptor, musician may all alike find an answering and inspiring note in the lines of the "Divine Comedy."

Nothing escapes Dante's notice; and, among other things, the student is struck by the poet's sensitiveness to sound in general. At present, however, our concern is with what we read of music in the poem. In the "Vita di Dante" Boccaccio writes: "Sommamente si diletto in suoni e canti nella sua giovinezza, e a ciascuno, che a quei tempi era ottimo cantatore, o suonatore, fu amico ed ebbe sua usanza." ("He greatly delighted in playing and singing in his youth, and was a friend to all who at that time excelled in singing and playing, and frequented their company.")

Dante had evidently studied music, and was accustomed to hearing it well performed.

To turn to the "Divine Comedy," to which these remarks are confined, we notice that in the Inferno there is no mention of music properly so-called, although there are a few allusions to musical instruments. In Canto vi. we read of the "angelica tromba" (the angelic trumpet); twice the horn is mentioned; allusion is made to the lute and the drum in one of the strange similes. Dante writes of the "hymn" which gurgles in the throats of the sullen who are submerged in the marsh of the Styx, and of the "lay" of the cranes.

It is not until we reach the Purgatorio, however, that we find a beginning of the many and exquisite allusions to music which enrich Dante's pages. Here it soon becomes evident that the poet was a true musician, and a real lover of the art in its highest forms and finest significance. How else could he have penned the lines in which he describes the breaking-up of the frozen depths of grief at the sound of the Angels' song of consolation after the bitter reproof uttered by Beatrice? How else could he have understood and repeatedly expressed in immortal words the utter rapture felt at moments of supreme revelation of musical beauty? Only to a true lover of music is it given to write thus, and, it may be added, only to a true lover of music is it given fully to understand what is thus written.

Dante almost always indicates the mental and moral effect of music. He shows very exact musical knowledge, and the reader is led to assume that he possessed a certain amount of technical skill.

It would be beyond the limits of one short paper to pretend to give an exhaustive list of the musical allusions throughout the "Divine Comedy"; the following pages will, therefore, be devoted to a selection of the most beautiful and suggestive among these allusions, together with a concise list of the musical terms used by Dante and the names of the Psalms and church hymns mentioned by him.

First, then, in the Purgatorio, we have the singing of the "In Exitu Israel" by the redeemed souls, as they cross the sea under the guidance of their Celestial Pilot. Again, in the same Canto, we read how Dante begged the musician Casella to sing his setting of the celebrated canzone, "Amor che nella mente mi ragiona," one of the finest of Dante's minor poems. The song is so ravishing that it draws the waiting souls away from what should be their first care—namely, the purification of their souls. Then come the hymns sung at evening-tide in the Valley of the Kings—the "Salve Regina" and the "Te lucis ante," which last, Dante says, was so sweet, that the sound of it took him out of himself—"Che fece me a me uscir di mente."

These allusions occur in the description of the Ante-Purgatory. On the threshold of Purgatory proper Dante's ears are greeted by what seems to him the singing of the "Te Deum laudamus," sounding as though accompanied by an organ, the words hardly to be distinguished. If any dweller in London will go down to the Westminster Cloisters on a summer day, when the Abbey doors are open, and listen to the choir chanting, he will have a beautiful illustration of these exquisite lines of Dante's.

As Dante and Virgil leave the Circle of the Proud they hear voices singing "Blessed are the poor in spirit," in such wise that words could not describe it. The Angel in the top-most circle sings "Blessed are the pure in heart" ("In voce assai più che la nostra viva"), in voice by far more living than our own. Another passage of peculiar charm occurs in Canto xxviii., where Dante speaks of the song of the birds amid the trees of the Terrestrial Paradise. He tells us that the soft breeze sighing through the thick forest was as a bass or pedal to the "rhymes" of the birds ("tenevan bordone alle sue rime"). Again, we have the songs in the mystic procession, and the "sweet melody which ran through the luminous air" as the august company advances through the forest. The singing of the "In te, Domine, speravi" melts Dante to tears; the "Asperges me," sung as he is immersed in the stream of Lethe, is so beautiful that he cannot even remember it fully, much less write of it.

The music in the Purgatorio is in entire accordance with the whole spirit of the Cantica. A subdued hopefulness breathes in the note of sorrow; in the longing for deliverance glows the certainty of final attainment.

But, as we should naturally expect, the most numerous and beautiful descriptions of music occur in the Paradiso. It is truly "la dolce sinfonia di Paradiso" that we hear on every hand. It should be noted that in many cases in the Paradiso, music is associated with dancing as an outward expression of an inward bliss. The picture of a kind of choric dance often rises before us as we read of the manifestations of joy in the successive spheres. In Dante's mind, dancing was evidently not the mere frivolous amusement of modern days, but was fraught with a dignity which made it a mode of self-expression not unmeet for the loftiest associations.

The music in the Paradiso, like that in the Purgatorio, is in complete harmony with its surroundings, and expresses a wonderful mystic joy, a sense of perfect fulfilment and fruition.

Some few of the finest allusions must be quoted. Take, for example, the following:—

*Diverse voci fau più dolci note;
Cosè diversi scanni, in nostra vita,
Rendon dolce armonia tra queste ruote.*

*(Voices diverse make up sweet melodies;
So in this life of ours the seats diverse Render sweet harmony among these spheres.)*

Then in the heaven of the Sun, where the song seems to communicate itself to all the spirits in turn—

*E moto a moto, e canto a canto colse;
Canto, che tanto vince nostre Muse,
Nostre Sirene, in quelle dolci tube,
Quanto primo splendor quel ch'è refuse.*

*(And motion joined to motion, song to song;
Song that as greatly doth transcend our Muses,
Our Sirens, in those dulcet clarions,
As primal splendour that which is reflected.)*

In Canto xiv. Dante speaks of a melody so ravishing that to hear it would be a reward for any merit—

*Tal melodia
Ch'ad ogni merito saria giusto muno.*

In the same Canto occurs the exquisite description of the song or hymn of the spirits in the heaven of Mars—

*Una melode,
Che mi rapiva senza intender l' inno.
(A melody Which rapt me, not distinguishing the hymn.)*

Here it is that he speaks of the "lute and harp, accordant strung with many strings," and their "dulcet tinkling." The poet adds:

*That until then there was not anything
That e'er had fettered me with such sweet bonds,*

thus expressing an intense love and appreciation of music.

In Canto xxiii., where the poet describes the coronation of the Blessed Virgin, there are two beautiful allusions to song. The "Regina cœli" is so sweetly sung, that the delight of the remembrance never leaves him:—

Che mai da me non si partì il diletto.

The song of Gabriel is so surpassing that the sweetest melody of earth—that which most could draw the soul to itself—would be but displeasing when compared to it. Note again the allusion to the power of music over the soul.

We may turn to one or two instances where Dante shows some real knowledge of the art, taking, for example, the lines which so aptly suggest singing in part:—

*Come in voce voce si discerne,

*(As within a voice a voice discerned,
When one is steadfast, and one comes and goes.)*

And again, the celebrated line in the Purgatorio, "tenevan bordone alle sue rime" ("were a bass, or pedal, to their song"), and another passage from the Paradiso, which alludes to good accompaniment:—

*Come a buon cantor buon citarista
Fa seguir lo guizzo della corda,
In che più di piacer lo canto acquista.*

*(And as good singer and good lutanist
Accompanies with vibrations of the chords, Whereby more pleasantness the song acquires.)*

More instances might be quoted, but these are enough to illustrate the fact that Dante had himself studied music. A short enumeration of the various musical instruments mentioned by Dante, and of the musical terms used by him throughout the "Comedy," can hardly fail to be interesting either to the musician or to the lover of Dante's poem.

We find mention of the following instruments: "Sampogna," bagpipe; "corno," or horn; "tuba" or "tromba," or trumpet; "arpa," or harp; "tambura," or drum; "citarà" (used for lyre, guitar, or harp); "organo," organ; "lira," or lyre; "liuto," or lute; and "cetra," a kind of guitar. One of these instruments was on view in the late Exhibition of Venetian Art, and was made by the celebrated Gaspar da Salo. "Giga" is an instrument which it is rather puzzling to identify. Possibly it is the same as the instrument known as the "giga-lira." One dictionary gives "hurdy-gurdy" and another the German "Strohpfedel," or Xylophone, as the equivalent. "Squilla," or bell, is used in a sense suggestive of a musical instrument, and one great commentator considers that in one passage in the Paradiso the carillon is indicated.

Dante employs several musical terms, and evidently with full appreciation of their meaning and value. Such are "sinfonia," "melodia," "armonia," "canto," and "cantilena." "Inno," or hymn, is mentioned, also lay and psalmody. "Carola," a dance accompanied by singing, and "caribo," another word with apparently the same meaning, also occur.

Dante makes mention of many Church Hymns and Psalms, weaving them into his wonderful story with master-hand. In the Inferno there is a weird play on the opening line of the "Vexilla Regis prodeunt." In the "Purgatorio" the "Salve Regina" and the "Te lucis ante" are sung by the spirits in the Valley of the Kings (our Henry III. joining in); Dante hears the "Te Deum" as he enters the great gate; the souls of the Wrathful repeat with one accord the "Agnus Dei"; the "Gloria in Excelsis" is sung by the whole of Purgatory as a purified soul rises to the true life; the mystic group round Beatrice sing or say the "Benedictus qui venis."

In the Paradiso, we have the "Ave Maria," sung by Piccarda as she vanishes from Dante's sight. The glorified spirit of Justinian sings "Osanna, Sanctus Deus Sabaoth," and on two other occasions the singing of "Osanna" is mentioned, besides other passing allusions.

The "Regina Cœli" is sung in the Heaven of the Fixed Stars, and after Dante's confession of faith the "Te Deum" is sung, but this time to the melody which is used in heaven—"Nella melode che lassù si canta."

Farther on, after Dante's definition of charity, the "Sanctus" is sung—a most sweet song resounding through heaven. These last two seem to lead up to the glorious burst of praise with which all Paradise chants the "Gloria Patris" (Canto xxvii.). Many Psalms also are quoted in the Purgatorio and Paradiso. The song of the saved, as they cross the sea, steered by their Celestial Pilot, is the 114th Psalm, "When Israel came out of Egypt"; the souls of the violently slain sing the "Miserere"; the souls of those who are being purified from the sin of avarice repeat a verse from Psalm cxix., "My soul cleaveth to the dust"; the once gluttonous learn to open their mouth in praise and prayer, and sing a verse from the "Miserere," "Thou shalt open my lips, O Lord."

The beautiful lady, Matilda, who sings amid the flowers of the Terrestrial Paradise, greets Dante with words from the 32nd Psalm, "Blessed is he whose sin is covered."

The pitying angels round the triumphal car where Beatrice stands sing part of the 31st

Psalm, "In Thee, O Lord, have I put my trust."

In the last Canto of the Purgatorio, Beatrice sighs over the captivity of the Church, while the seven attendant Virtues weep as they lament in sweet psalmody, using the words of the 79th Psalm, "Deus, venerunt gentes" ("O Lord, the heathen have come into Thine inheritance").

This seems to complete the list of musical instruments, hymns, and Psalms mentioned by Dante, and the strictly musical terms used by him in the Divine Comedy. It is interesting to note, in passing, that the one Roman treatise on music that has any claim to completeness was written by Boethius, for whom Dante has so great a love and reverence.

As was said at the outset, this paper does not pretend to contain a complete account of what may be called "Dante's Music." It is hoped, however, that these few suggestions and indications may stimulate readers to search Dante's matchless pages for themselves, pages where all that is noblest in human life is enshrined in words of undying beauty and power.

THE return, after an interval of just ten years, of Herr Eduard Strauss to these shores has undoubtedly been one of the most agreeable features of the musical season. His last visit to London was during the "Inventories," in 1885, and students of Punch will remember the excellent portrait of him which appeared in that journal (June 20, 1885) from the pen of Mr. Linley Sambourne, with the legend "Dance Music" and the lines—

He hops and schumps und marks der time,
Und shows such taste and nous,
Dot dere's to equal him no vun,
Mine clever Eduard Strauss.

The lapse of ten years have happily left Eduard Strauss's electrical energy almost unimpaired. Indeed, when one watches him conducting one is reminded of the mercurial personages in Foote's famous "Panjandrum" Fantasia, of whom it is recorded that the "gunpowder ran out of the heels of their boots." His readings of classical or standard works may pass muster, though it can hardly be considered satisfactory. But to hear Strauss conducting his own or his brother's music is a thing quite apart. It is not too much to say that he is the chief performer of his band, even when he is wielding his bâton and not leading the violins. The man is the very living incarnation of the lilt and swing of the waltz. He conducts with his whole body, his hands, his feet, and even his eyebrows. There are some excellent players in the band, but the quality of tone is nothing out of the common; what lends attractiveness to their performance is the unanimity with which they follow the indications of their leader and the spirit and abandon of their playing. Of the real musical value of the compositions of the Strausses the highest and most exacting critics have left their opinion on record in no uncertain terms. Wagner declared that a Strauss waltz was in its way a thoroughly artistic and beautiful thing; Brahms is a constant and appreciative attendant at the performances of the Strauss band in Vienna, and a warm personal friend of Johann Strauss, the "Walzerkönig." As for the late von Bülow, he not only stated it as his opinion that a Strauss waltz was worthy of inclusion in the programme of a Symphony Concert, but carried his principles into practice. While we are on the subject of the Strausses, and in view of the inaccuracies of authors like Larousse, it is perhaps worth while to call attention to the fact that the composer of the famous "Blue Danube" was not Johann Strauss père (1804-1849), who first visited London in the year of the Queen's coronation, but Johann fils, born in 1825, whose jubilee was celebrated last October. Joseph, the second brother (1827-1870), evinced hardly less talent, while some of the waltzes of Eduard are little, if at all, inferior to those of the author of the "Blue Danube." The Paris Strauss, also a conductor and composer of great talent, of whom Berlioz makes eulogistic mention in his Memoirs, hailed from Strassbourg, and belonged to another family. He succeeded Musard as director of the masked balls at the Grand Opéra, and conducted the court balls during the whole of the Second Empire. The Strausses have, in short, been such an institution for the last sixty years, and have contributed with such unflinching success to the gaiety of nations, that it is a matter for serious regret that the dynasty seems likely to end in the second generation.

THE June number of La Revue de Paris contains the first instalment of Gounod's "Mémoires d'un Artiste"—practically the great French composer's autobiography. He commences with an eloquent expression of gratitude to his mother, to whom he asserts the credit of all he has been able to accomplish is due. "It is she who nourished me, brought me up and formed me: not, alas! in her own image—that would have been too beautiful. It was not her fault, however, but mine, that anything was lacking." An account is then given of his mother's early life in Rouen, where she was born in 1780. He hints at, but does not describe, grave family troubles that deprived her at an early age of the society of her mother, and, by throwing her upon her own resources, developed the strong qualities which were afterwards so serviceable. The future Madame Gounod—then named Lemachois—began to give pianoforte lessons at the age of eleven! One scarcely knows whether teacher or pupils were most deserving of pity. Gounod gives interesting details of his mother's musical progress, first as a pupil of Adam (father of the composer Adolphe Adam) and later under Beethoven's friend, the violinist Hullmandel. We are then introduced to François Louis Gounod, the father, a distinguished painter, who married Mlle. Lemachois in 1806, she being then twenty-six and he forty-seven. Gounod's picture of his father is that of a man of exceptional integrity and culture, but lacking in power of application. His death, in 1823, left Madame Gounod with two sons—Louis-Urbain, aged fifteen, and Charles, the future composer of "Faust," aged five, but without other means for their support and her own than she could hope to provide by her talents. She actually continued the drawing classes of her late husband, with such success that they grew larger than before, and of course re-commenced giving music lessons. At this point Gounod begins to describe himself and his early characteristics. The facts set forth are substantially the same as those described so felicitously in Mlle. de Bove's life of the composer, but they acquire new interest by reason of the delicate humour and literary grace imparted by Gounod's manner of relating them. His penchant for music was so strong that it led him occasionally to neglect other work at school. This brought about punishments which, so far from abating, only heightened the musical fever. Fortunately young Gounod's school was directed by a man of wide sympathies, Mr. Poirson. The world has reason to remember him with gratitude; for, hearing little Charles say he would like to be a composer, he gave him some verses to set, and on hearing the result kissed his pupil and said, "Va, mon enfant, fais de la musique!" The chapter continues with an account of Gounod's progress under Reicha and Halévy and brings the reader up to the time when he gained the Grand Prix de Rome and had a Mass of his composition performed at Saint-Eustache.

An interesting article in the New York Herald for the 7th ult. brings out the fact that three of the wealthiest men in the United States—Andrew Carnegie, John Rockefeller, and Henry Havemeyer—are united by their devotion to music, or, as our contemporary curiously puts it, not only find their recreation therein, but "spend a mint of money in pandering to this taste. Both Mr. Carnegie and Mr. Rockefeller are expert musical critics, and know the works of all the leading composers by heart, while Mr. Havemeyer is an accomplished violinist." When the Herald man went to interview Mr. Carnegie on the subject, the "Iron King" struck a Chinese gong 2,000 years old, and then observed, "I am very fond of music and musical things." Later on he observed, "Wagner is to music what Shakespeare is to the drama"; from which we gather that the Iron King—a sort of glorified harmonious blacksmith, in fact—has not fallen a victim to the Baconian heresy. Next let us turn to the "Standard Oil King." His home is in West Fifty-Fourth Street, and his family consists of the Oil King, his wife, and four children. They are all "thorough musicians." The children have an orchestra of their own, and recitals are given two or three times a week. The Oil King's daughters are both expert violinists, while his son is a member of the Brown University Glee Club. Finally, we read: "The great Oil King has always encouraged music in his family, and frequently the services of professionals are secured to sing or play at his parlour entertainments. So attached is he to music that at his home near Cleveland he has a big pipe organ in one of the parlours, to send forth its strains in oratorio work, of which he is very fond." The accomplishments of H. O. Havemeyer, the Sugar King, who dwells in a palace in Fifth Avenue, are even more striking. "He possesses a Stradivarius and two or three other valuable violins, and can make the strings sing as sweetly as if he were a rival to Ole Bull. . . . Occasionally Theodore Havemeyer, the brother of the Sugar King, who is a beautiful tenor singer, drops in, and then the tones of his voice blend with those of the violin and piano." As Mrs. Browning wrote of the performance of the "great god Pan," the tones of the Sugar King must indeed be "blinding sweet." And if only he could be induced to join in a trio for violin, Chinese gong, and pipe organ with the Iron and Standard Oil Kings, what a rich and sumptuous banquet of sound it would be! The tone of the Herald's article is unconsciously humorous, as the foregoing extracts may serve to show. Still, it brings home the fact that these great industrial magnates not only devote their leisure to the cultivation of music, but spend their money liberally to promote a sound taste amongst their less wealthy fellow-citizens. We could do very well with a few millionaires of this sort on this side of the Atlantic.

THIS year we celebrate the bi-centenary of the death of our Orpheus Britannicus, Henry Purcell, and it is interesting to note that another English musician deserves special remembrance by reason that this is the bi-centenary of his birth. Dr. Maurice Greene was born in 1695, as we learn from the register book of the Church of St. Olave, Old Jewry, of which his father, the Rev. Thomas Greene, was vicar. Greene commenced his musical career at an early age as a chorister in St. Paul's Cathedral; the master of the boys at the time was Charles King, one of the vicars choral, and the composer of several services which were for many years extremely popular in St. Paul's and other Cathedrals; these obtained for their author the soubriquet of "Mr. Serviceable King." When Greene's voice broke he was articulated to the organist of the Cathedral, Richard Brind, and must have distinguished himself, for he obtained, partly through the influential advocacy of his uncle, Sergeant Greene, the appointment of organist of St. Dunstan-in-the-West in the year 1716, and in the following year, on the retirement of Daniel Purcell, brother of the celebrated Henry, was promoted to a similar post in St. Andrew's, Holborn; he continued to hold both appointments until 1718, when, on the death of his master, Brind, he was chosen organist of St. Paul's Cathedral. In 1727 Dr. Croft died and was succeeded by Greene as Organist and Composer of the Chapels Royal. Three years afterward (1730) Dr. Thomas Tudway, the Professor of Music in Cambridge University, died, and Greene was made Professor and Doctor of Music; for the occasion he set Pope's "St. Cecilia Ode" to music. In 1737, by the death of Eccles, he added to his numerous appointments that of Master of the King's Band. Greene was conscientious and industrious, and in fulfilment of his duties composed some fifty anthems for the Chapels Royal, and numerous New Year Odes for the King, and also a thanksgiving Te Deum, with orchestral accompaniment, on the suppression of the 1745 rebellion. We may mention that the autograph scores of two Odes and the Te Deum are amongst the treasures in the library of Mr. W. H. Cummings. In addition to the music already cited he composed an enormous number of songs, an oratorio, sundry catches and canons, organ and harpsichord pieces. He was also one of the founders of the Royal Society of Musicians. In 1750, by the death of his cousin, he came into possession of his uncle's estate, Bois Hall, in Essex, with a rent-roll of £700 a year, and here, five years afterward, he died; his body was brought to London and buried in his father's vault beneath the pulpit of St. Olave, whence, on the destruction of the church in 1888, the coffin containing his remains was removed to St. Paul's Cathedral, and re-interred in the grave of Dr. Boyce. Greene's only daughter married the Rev. Michael Festing, son of the celebrated violinist, a friend of her father's, and also one of the founders of the Royal Society of Musicians.

It is especially interesting to note that the present Bishop of St. Alban's is a descendant of Greene's daughter, and that by permission of Mr. Henry Festing, of Bois Hall, Essex, an autotype reproduction of a portrait in oils of Dr. Greene will, by arrangement with Mr. C. T. Johnson, be published immediately. Much might be said of Greene's intimacy with Handel, who was wont, on frequent occasions, to play for hours on the organ in St. Paul's Cathedral, often aided by the enthusiastic zeal of Greene, who voluntarily officiated as organ-blower. Subsequently, the friends became somewhat estranged, probably through the injudicious, well-meant, but ill-contrived action of mutual friends, and also by the unfortunate conduct of Handel's rival, Bononcini. It is said that at this later period some busybody took a MS. composition of Greene's to Handel, who forthwith hung it out of the window, remarking that it wanted "air"—a preposterous story, for one of the most striking features of Greene's music is its overflowing melodiousness. This may easily be verified by examining some of his anthems published by Novello; such, for example, as "Acquaint thyself with God," "Thou, O God, art praised in Zion," "Thou visitest the earth." It can also easily be discovered that Greene could, when he pleased, write noble and majestic music; the anthems "God is our hope and strength," "I will sing of Thy power," "O clap your hands," and "O give thanks" may be cited in proof. It was the fashion some five-and-twenty years ago to decry Greene's music, but an honest examination of his printed forty anthems will convince any honest musician that he was a composer of whom we may justly be proud; and it is to be hoped that the bi-centenary of his birth will induce all lovers of church music to endeavour to rescue from unmerited neglect the many treasures his genius has bequeathed to us.

MR. F. CORDER'S recently concluded Lectures to the students of the Royal Academy of Music, on Musical Composition, notices of which have appeared in these columns, contained truths which can scarcely be too deeply impressed upon young musicians. The old saying that "knowledge is power" is in no art more true than in music. To know what has been done, to realise what can and what cannot be successfully expressed, and to be acquainted with the works of contemporary writers—these are the means by which technical knowledge can be turned to satisfactory account. In his endeavours, however, to dispel absurd and, it is to be feared, widely held views concerning "inspiration," Mr. Corder went somewhat too far. It is perfectly true that a good work of art can be produced by any thoroughly trained musician by a series of carefully calculated efforts and the employment of well-known methods. There are thousands of such works. They crowd the shelves of every publisher—where they remain. Paradoxical as it may seem, few things are easier to the accomplished writer than to express the vacuity of his mind in glowing language. Composers are constantly proving this fact. There is, indeed, to deft workmen, a certain charm in making a something out of what is practically nothing, and there is no Act of Parliament to prevent them. Would there were! But that which is born of calculation differs widely from that which the brain produces by unconscious effort. Mental assimilation and consequent development may be, and probably are, the result of the working of certain definite processes; but inasmuch as we are in ignorance of them, it is convenient to call the result "inspiration." It is scarcely justifiable to say that Beethoven was not "inspired" because he spent years in perfecting his themes. Each step towards perfection was probably as true an inspiration as the first conception of the subject. There are hundreds of songs equal in beauty of form, harmony, and workmanship, but only a few possess "that something" which speaks to us with the force of a living thing. We cannot analyse "life." It may appeal to the reason of some to deny the existence of life in art. This makes no difference. It is there. Feed it, nourish it, treasure it, O, young composers, and strive to fit yourselves to give it due expression when, but only when, it cries for birth. Again, the statement that no melodic phrase had any character of its own will hardly be accepted by composers. If this were true, how is it that, in some works, the themes are inappropriate to their treatment? Is there no difference in suggestiveness between the melody which proceeds by small intervals and that which chiefly consists of wide skips? It will be a sad day for music when composers fail to recognise distinctive appropriateness in melody.

EVERYONE knows how Beethoven's Sketch Books, in more or less mutilated form, have been scattered throughout the world. Some leaves are lost, some have been torn out to satisfy the longing of ardent worshippers of the master to possess an autograph, and some of the books may actually have been cut up for commercial purposes. Whether all the scattered leaves will ever be gathered together again is very doubtful. Meanwhile, however, fresh discoveries are happily being made. We recently referred to some sheets acquired by the British Museum; and now, in Dr. Otto Lessmann's paper, the Allgemeine Musik-Zeitung, of the 14th ult., Dr. Wilhelm Kienzl gives an interesting account of some Beethoven sketches discovered, at the beginning of this year, by Herr Guido Peters. The latter was looking through a bundle of old music which, by the death of a relative, had come into his possession. On a cover he read, to his great surprise and joy, the words, "Manuscript Beethoven's." Inside were five pages of undoubted autograph sketches, belonging to the year 1809. They contain sketches for the second and third movements of the E flat Pianoforte Concerto. The fourth page presents a detailed sketch of a part of the introduction of the Choral Fantasia (Op. 80); the notes are written at first in pencil, afterwards in ink. Beethoven played the pianoforte part when the work was produced at Vienna, on December 22, 1808, but the Introduction, as now printed, had not then been composed. Carl Czerny relates that the Fantasia was completed so late, that it was scarcely rehearsed. Now at the head of the sketch mentioned above stand the words: "Morgens fertigen, Nachmittags probiren, nachsinnen, grübeln," and it is, almost without doubt, the actual paper from which Beethoven worked out a free "fantasia" at the Concert. Dr. Kienzl gives the whole of this highly interesting sketch. Further, the sheets contain a sketch of "Kennst du das Land," the only one hitherto known, and also sketches for a patriotic song, "Wenn es nur will," probably sung at the Redouten Saal, Vienna, during the exciting days of March, 1809. The composition was hitherto unknown; Dr. Kienzl gives a fac-simile of it. It is curious to note the resemblance between the opening of this song and that of "Kennst du das Land." We place them side by side—

"A NEW ART" is an attractive title wherewith to appeal to Londoners, who, like the Athenians of old, love novelties. Unfortunately, however, Mr. Rimington's display of coloured lights, on the 6th ult., at St. James's Hall, failed to justify the announcement. The blending of colours to suggest emotions has long been successfully practised in ballet, and the endeavour to associate colour with musical sounds has been often attempted. In the latter respect the latest effort has been no more successful than its predecessors. Mr. Rimington employs a large box dignified by the name of "colour organ," which is furnished with a number of apertures filled with different tinted glass. These holes are illuminated from within and are fitted with shutters controlled by a pianoforte keyboard, the manipulation of which causes various tints to be thrown upon a screen. As, however, the colours are respectively repeated for the notes of each octave, the representations of pitch are confined to that limit. Variations of timbre are also entirely unnoticed. Thus, a fortissimo from a trombone gives precisely the same intensity of colour as the altissimo squeal of a fife. Again, the arbitrary association of each note with a specific shade in the spectrum sometimes results in the production of glaring crudities, and when the keys are played at all rapidly the effect is blinding. Moreover, many of the richest chords are represented by the coldest shades, the method thus failing psychologically. A greater failure has, indeed, seldom been seen. It could scarcely be otherwise. Colour-changes, to be pleasing and suggestive to the eye, must, from the nature of that organ, be made slowly, and consequently colour can only represent a very limited portion of the effects of music on the ear.

In the course of an amusing article in vindication of Bœotia from the stigma of literary incapacity which has for centuries attached to that district, a leader writer in the Daily Chronicle incidentally broaches a question of interest to musicians—how far a certain moral character may attach to particular instruments. It appears that the irrepressible M. Zola, in a conversation with Daudet and Coppée, reported by M. Edmond de Goncourt in the new volume of his Diary, remarked that "the clarinet represents sensual love, while the flute at most represents platonic love." Now we are very far from desiring to take away the character of the clarinet on the authority of one who knows so little about music as M. Zola, but his description of the flute may pass as being fairly consonant with the average view of the characteristics of its tone-colour. But the strange thing is that whereas we nowadays look upon the flute as one of the most passionless of instruments—Schumann alludes in one of his letters to its "ethereal tones"—the ancients regarded it in a very different light. Thus the great Aristotle himself pronounced against the flute on the ground that its moral effect was bad and exciting. How Rossini would have laughed at this onslaught on the mildest and meekest of instruments! It would be interesting to hear Aristotle's observations after hearing, say, the "Walkürenritt." If the flute struck him as immoral, what would he have said to the tuba or the bass clarinet? On the other hand, we are assured by the Chronicle that a modern schoolmaster has discovered that there is something in performance on a wind-instrument which is "particularly salutary for a boy with excessive and boisterous vitality."

MESSRS. NOVELLO AND Co., the plaintiffs in the American action "Novello and Co. v. The Oliver Ditson Co.," have just heard from their counsel, Mr. Lauriston L. Scaife, of Boston, U.S. America, to the effect that the defendants have decided not to appeal to the Supreme Court, and that the litigation is therefore finally closed. Legal effect was given to this understanding on the 11th ult., when Mr. Scaife, after giving formal notice to the other side, brought a motion in the Circuit Court of Appeals for "a mandate," the effect of which when issued is to deprive the other side of their right to carry the case to the United States Supreme Court. This motion was not opposed, the mandate was ordered to be issued, and thus the litigation is finally closed.

FACTS, RUMOURS, AND REMARKS.

A CORRESPONDENT has kindly brought to my knowledge the existence of a very remarkable musical reporter, who does service to, and sheds brilliant light upon a country journal, the name of which is immaterial. In the course of a long article devoted to a local concert I have come upon quite a string of gems, too many for complete display here, and the reader's amused attention must be limited to a few of the best. The reporter makes a good start: "The chorus, with the opening overture, evinced considerable command in the treatment of their complex score, the skilful modulation of their full volume being cleverly managed." Then come the following in order: "Mr. Nicholson sang Handel's accompaniment to the grand and characteristic verse of Smollett." "The soprano air taxed the voice of Mrs. — who emerged, however, solaced by the well-merited applause." "The chorus, a pleasing memento of the ages of poetic buckrum," &c. "Handel's frequently recurring tone of expressing the idea of sleep finds fit expression in 'Gentle Morpheus, son of Sleep,' Mrs. — chasing the 'Little God Sleep' from the eyelids of her audience in a pleasant manner." "A witching soprano air which 'soothed the weary critic's brain' to his satisfaction." "Karl Marca von Weber, the father of pianoforte music, was honoured by being allowed to open the second part, his 'Preciose' as interpreted by  being so profound as to allow that master to sleep in his grave." "Evidence such as this bereaves us of any belief that talent has fled from our immediate shores." This writer should not hide his light in the columns of a country paper. He (or she) would at once attract attention in London and I recommend him (or her) to editors in want of a new critic.

MR. JUSTICE CHITTY has been taken to task for his decision in the St. John's Wood musical nuisance case, and I do not say that the judgment is other than hard upon the Italian teachers, who are now forbidden to give lessons in their own house. But it was also hard for the complaining neighbour to have the exercises of vocal students in her ears during many hours of the day.

PEOPLE in this crowded London must, of course, learn to give and take or there is no getting on at all. At the same time, tenants of houses must consider the obligations of their lease and be prepared to carry them out. It may be said that the Italian teachers, who were temporary tenants of a furnished residence, knew nothing of the lease. But ignorance is no defence, and Justice Chitty had no alternative but to decide as he did.

THERE has been a little stir on the subject of marching songs for soldiers, a certain French General giving the cue by urging the men under his command to cheer the way with harmony. There is a good field for musical activity in this direction, and the time may come when our own Thomas Atkins will attend regimental singing classes, and have his vocal prowess immortalised in Rudyard Kipling verse. He is not likely to fight the worse for being able to sing well.

THE approaching Festival at Cardiff will not be remarkable for a glut of native music. Dr. Stanford has undertaken a choral work, "The Bard." Mr. German will have an Orchestral Suite ready, and Mr. David Jenkins promises "A Psalm of Life." But the committee have gone to Belgium for a work entitled "St. Francis," and they offer compositions by Verdi, Berlioz, &c. True, there is Sullivan's "Light of the World," so, after all, perhaps, we may not complain. What our composers—who see works written for one Festival ignored by all the others—have in their minds about the matter is another question.

MR. FRIENDSHIP, Organist of St. Saviour's, Dartmouth, sends an amusing story connected with his church, and especially with a former holder of his post: "The funds of the church being low, and the organist having had to wait some weeks for his salary, a special offertory was announced. On the offertory being brought up, the curate most innocently, and much to the amusement of choir and congregation, read the text: 'Blessed is the man that provideth for the sick and needy,' &c."

MR. HENRY E. DALBY, of Deal, writes concerning William Shield as under:—

I have read with much pleasure in THE MUSICAL TIMES your notice of one of our best native musicians, William Shield. You have omitted (I expect by an oversight) to mention his "Treatise on Harmony," or, as he called it, "Introduction to Harmony," which was, I believe, a standard work in its day, and is of considerable interest to musicians still. I have by me a well preserved copy inscribed as follows: "To the memory of the Right Honourable Lady Charlotte Bertie, as a testimony of respect for virtue, duty, and accomplishments, this Introduction to Harmony is inscribed by William Shield. Printed for the Author and sold by G. G. & J. Robinson, Pater Noster Row. 1800." The work concludes with the following: "Although it is contrary to my general plan to address any professional gentleman by name in the Introduction, yet I cannot prevail with myself to write the final word before I have publicly acknowledged the services which Dr. Arnold has rendered me by the loan of his musical type. I likewise lie under particular obligations to my much-honoured master, Sir William Parsons (so do all grateful musicians), whose merit and conduct have given a consequence to a profession which it never before experienced, at least in England; for which may he enjoy his exalted situation as long as I have the honour to be Musician in Ordinary to the best of Monarchs."

Sir William Parsons, an old Westminster chorister, succeeded Stanley as Master of the King's Band, in 1785. Ten years later he was knighted by the Lord Lieutenant of Ireland, and subsequently sat as magistrate in the Great Marlborough Street Police Court. He died in 1817.

LAST month I expressed some doubts as to the accuracy of a report which credited Miss Olive Harcourt's voice with a range of four octaves. I have since been favoured with a communication from the young lady, and here quote the material part thereof: "I beg to enclose a critique from the celebrated Leipzig musical paper, Chorgesang, written by a well-known German musician, stating that my voice extends from the contralto low E to the C above the fifth ledger line. Since this was written my voice has gained largely in power and somewhat in compass, so that, only to-day, I easily attained the following range"—the writer here shows in notation the bass C sharp (second space) and the highest C on the pianoforte. She continues: "As I often, when in special voice, attain one or two half-tones above this, the four octaves are proved to be a fact." And the fact is very wonderful.

IN THE MUSICAL TIMES for June I appealed to Dr. Joseph C. Bridge for information concerning one Thomas Spence, said to have been, for an uncommon number of years, on the musical staff of Chester Cathedral. In the kindest manner (for which I am infinitely obliged) Dr. Bridge has looked up old Spence, and I am now able to give the desired particulars. He writes:—

The inscription quoted by your correspondent no longer exists, the stone having probably been lost or broken during the restoration of the Cathedral; but there has always been a tradition that Thomas Spence's official life was a very long one. The epitaph says he served as a chorister for seventy-nine years. The obituary notice from the Chester Chronicle (the file of which is still preserved) says: "Monday, Mr. Thomas Spence, one of the vicars choral of our Cathedral, aged eighty-eight, eighty-two of which he had served in that situation with the greatest fidelity; a man much lamented and universally respected." Then follows an account of the funeral, and it is interesting to read that "The Dean and the sacrist, the clerks, choristers and vergers, &c., preceded the corpse through the cloisters, where the Dean read the usual sentences, into the broad aisle, where, as soon as the procession made its appearance, a solemn dirge was performed on the organ. . . ." From the treasurer's accounts and the minute books of the Chapter, I find that Thomas Spence became a chorister in 1733, and ceased to be a chorister April 6, 1741. He was appointed lay clerk, Wednesday, August 1, 1744, and held this office until his death in 1809. The minute book says: "It was agreed that Thomas Spence sometime since a singing boy or chorister of this church be admitted . . . a conduct or singing man." It will be seen, therefore, that Spence's connection with the Cathedral was of seventy-two years duration. The tombstone and the obituary notice both state that he was eighty-eight years of age when he died. This places his birth in 1721, and therefore he must have been twelve years old when admitted as a chorister, and twenty when he ceased to hold that office! Possibly the old gentleman added on a few years towards the end of his career, when speaking of his age and the amount of time he had served in the Cathedral.

WITH all respect for religious zeal, I do not quite see eye to eye with the Protestants who objected to the London Sunday School Choir singing music set to the well-known verses beginning "Ave Maria, 'tis the hour of prayer." The little poem contains no prayer to the Mother, and those who demur to the "Hail, Mary," must logically disapprove the salutation of the Angel at the Annunciation. Even in religion there is such a thing as zeal without discretion.

THE printer's boy did good business in the Scotsman office a few days ago. That journal's London musical critic wired: "Harold is absolved from his oath by Stigand," and the boy made him say, "Harold is absolved from his bath by St. Igand." I hear that the poor critic has not smiled since.

ANOTHER London correspondent is unhappy. The Manchester Courier devoted a par. to the first Nikisch Concert, and began thus: "When the works of Dvorák were first performed in England the musical reputation of Hungary was at once established. Herr Nikisch, of the Buda-Pesth opera, has proved that his country is also capable of producing a great conductor. His programme at the Queen's Hall was ambitious in scope, comprising the C minor Symphony of Beethoven, the Overture from 'Tannhäuser,' and the 'Peer Gynt' Suite." Which is the worst enemy of a critic, the boy or an ambitious sub-editor addicted to airing such knowledge as that Dvorák established the musical reputation of Hungary? And in a Manchester paper, too!

JOSEPH BENNETT.

ROYAL OPERA, COVENT GARDEN.

In recalling the operatic events of the past month, two scenes rise vividly before the mind's eye. They are the production, on the 8th ult., of Mr. Frederic H. Cowen's historical opera "Harold," at Covent Garden Theatre; and the re-appearance, three days later, of Madame Patti on the English stage as Violetta in "La Traviata." A synopsis of the libretto, with the principal musical themes of Mr. Cowen's work, appeared in last month's issue of THE MUSICAL TIMES, and readers of these remarks will doubtless have perused many notices of the opera, not a few written in haste, and in the majority of instances in the fervour of first impressions. Our task is, therefore, to record second thoughts, which, if not always best, can mostly claim conscientious endeavour. In attempting to form an opinion as to the artistic value of Mr. Cowen's work, two important facts should be kept well in view. The first is that it deals with historical incidents of the eleventh century, the second that it is avowedly an English opera. The former demanded of the composer, according to modern requirements, a bluntness and vigour in the music reflective of the rough sentiment and martial spirit of the period; and the latter the style of the English school of music. To compare Mr. Cowen's work, therefore, with the productions of the modern French or Italian writers is unfair. It is to judge Boadicea by Marie Antoinette. "Harold," to be reviewed justly, must be regarded as the latest example of English musical expression in opera, and so viewed it may be unhesitatingly pronounced as a worthy representative of its class. The melodies are direct and English in character, the vocal parts are effectively laid out for the voices, and the instrumentation is throughout masterly. Memory has stored in sequestered safety the charm and graceful fancy contained in the first act, notably the song and dance of the women of Alfnoth's household; the expressive opening of the third act, and the funeral march, in which the composer has expressed with dignity and power the mental attitude of reverential sorrow. At the second performance, which took place on the 21st ult., some improvements were made in the representation, notably by the transference of the Duke of Normandy's song concerning his ambition to the scene in the garden at Bayeux; and by the substitution of a dimly-shown skeleton in place of the eleventh century wax bishop in his fine plate-glass case and electric light illumination.

The opera was fortunate in two of its exponents. Madame Albani, as Edith, sang with rare beauty of voice, and threw herself with a sympathetic intensity into her task that made her impersonation memorable; and Mr. David Bispham impersonated the Duke of Normandy with the earnestness and completeness that always distinguish this artist's endeavours. Miss Meisslinger strove to impart life to the ungrateful portraiture of the Duke's daughter, Princess Adela, and made perhaps all that was possible of her interview with Harold; for St. Cecilia is too pure-minded to be able to express dissimulation successfully, and this feigned love duet shows how little the librettist knows of the requirements of the composer in modern opera. Mr. Brozel tried hard to be a hero, but Harold is a dupe from first to last—he slays no one, he commits no moral enormity, possesses no exaggerated virtue, has not even the courtesy to return to life to sing a dying duet with the faithful Edith. He is, in fact, a not very estimable opportunist. What can actor or composer do with such a man? For the rest of the cast it is sufficient to say that Mr. Devers doubled the parts of Alfnoth and Stigand; M. Jacques Bars represented Siward, and Mr. Richard Green appeared as Malet. The mounting was excellent, and if the chorus did not always know where to go and what to do, it may be accredited with good intention, evinced by refreshing varieties of gestures. The composer conducted, and the many times he was called to the stage testified to the audience's appreciation of the excellence of his efforts and its recognition of the great advance which the opera shows in his power of dramatic expression.

The personation of Falstaff by M. Maurel, on the 10th ult., should put renewed life in England into Verdi's latest opera. It is not too much to say that this artist's portrayal of the fat knight was a revelation, even to the greatest admirers of the opera. The remarkable applicableness of the music to the incidents and varying sentiments was shown with extraordinary clearness by rare subtlety of gesture, facial expression, and apparently exhausted shades of vocal timbre. This was especially demonstrated in the song in ridicule of honour and in the rendering of "When I was a page." A world of meaning was put into each "no" in the former, while the latter had to be given three times before the listeners would permit the performance to proceed.

An enormous audience crowded every part of the spacious theatre when the curtain rose on the 11th ult., and it went away well satisfied. Father Time has dealt gently with Madame Patti's voice, and, as though in regret for having robbed it of some of its pristine brilliancy, has increased this artist's histrionic power. Madame Patti sang with great beauty of tone, perfection of phrasing, and soul-stirring expression; but it was by her acting that her appearance on this occasion will be most remembered. Violetta became a living reality, not by the exaggeration of the objectionable, but by the emphasis and portrayal of the nobler virtues which make women angels. The interview with the father, the passionate despair of the farewell to her lover, and the final scene in the last act were life-like, because they were true in conception and consistent in expression to the smallest detail. To the student Madame Patti's impersonation was a magnificent lesson on the mightiness of little things. Signor Ancona has never given a more successful personation than that of Germon, but Signor de Lucia as Alfredo indulged in a persistent vibrato which greatly marred his efforts. Mdlle. Bauermeister, Mdlle. Brani, M. Jacques Bars, Signor Igenio Corsi, and M. Gillibert completed the cast, whose dresses presented familiar styles of several centuries. Signor Mancinelli conducted.

On the 18th ult. Signor Tamagno was joined in "Otello" by M. Maurel and Miss Macintyre, the result being a performance of remarkable excellence. No finer exponents of the Moor and his "Ancient" in the second and third acts could, indeed, be found than these gentlemen, and the interpretations of the "Credo" and the subsequent duet were unsurpassable. M. Maurel's reading of Iago seems, indeed, to be the very embodiment of demon-like malignity, frequently approaching the terrible in its intensity; but always associated with a dignity of gesture, to which, indeed, it owes no little of its force. Miss Macintyre is to be congratulated on her impersonation of Desdemona. Full justice was done to the music, and her reading was distinguished by the sweetness and nobility that the character demands.

The revival of Rossini's "Il Barbiere di Siviglia," on the 19th ult., served to show Madame Patti's versatility as an actress and the perfection of her vocalisation. The impersonation of Rosina was the ideal of youthful exuberance and light-heartedness, and the facility and clearness with which the florid passages were sung seemed to mock their difficulty. How real these difficulties are was made apparent when they came to the mouths of the other singers, whose renderings can only be described as full of good intentions and gallant endeavours. As a consequence many of the numbers failed to create the interest usually excited in former times. Signor Pini-Corsi as Bartolo and Signor Arimondi as Basilio were the most successful vocally, the aria "La Calunnia" being cleverly sung by the latter, and the humour and vivacity of the former being much appreciated. Mdlle. Bauermeister as Bertha, Signor Ancona as Figaro, and M. Bonnard as Almaviva acted with zeal and discharged their duties with spirit. That Madame Patti should sing "Bel Raggio" and "Home, sweet home," in the "lesson scene" was permissible, but that she should conclude the opera by a feeble new waltz air in place of Rossini's Finale was scarcely justifiable.

Much interest was excited by the appearance of Madame Bellincioni, "the original Santuzza," in "Cavalleria Rusticana." This lady may be said to have realised the expectations engendered by her Continental reputation. Her impersonation of the unfortunate heroine approaches closely that of Madame Calvé, but the voice is somewhat shrill in the upper register. Signorina Giulia Ravogli, Mdlle. Bauermeister, Signor Vignas, and Signor Ancona constituted an excellent cast.

GERMAN OPERA.

THE Ducal Court Company of Saxe-Coburg and Gotha appeared for the first time in England, at Drury Lane Theatre, on the 17th ult., when a performance was given of Carl Zeller's comic opera "Der Vogelhändler" (The Bird Fancier). This work has for some time enjoyed much popularity on the Continent, a fact which may be attributed equally to the amusing nature of its libretto, written by M. Mest and L. Held, and the brightness and melodiousness of its music. It is true that to English musicians the prevalence of waltz rhythm becomes monotonous, but it has doubtless conduced to the ready reception of the music. The waltz is the best of all rhythms to nod to. The most pleasing number is perhaps the Princess's parasol song and chorus in the first act. This, and the "Nightingale song," in the second act, met with due appreciation. The orchestration shows the hand of a cultured musician. Of the twenty-three singers who appeared in the cast, the most acceptable was Madame Iika von Palmay, who, as the heroine, Christel, sang and acted with a vivacity reminiscent of earlier days, when Offenbach's operas occupied the European stage. The successful efforts of Herr Mahling as Adam are also worthy of record, and a satisfactory feature of the performance was the intelligence with which the members of the company endeavoured to invest their respective parts with appropriate dramatic individuality. Herr Døebber conducted with skill, but the vocal ensemble would scarcely have been accepted by the frequenters of English comic opera.

After playing some dramas the company appeared, on the 22nd ult., in Johann Strauss's comic opera "Der Fledermaus" (The Bat), originally produced some twenty-one years ago at Vienna. The light-hearted and merry humour of the work was entered into with much spirit by all concerned in the representation, and the delightful irresponsible spontaneity of the music was well expressed. Fräulein Dirksen-Dreus, who impersonated the flighty wife, is not so good a vocalist as Madame Palmay, but she acted with engaging vivacity, and was well supported by Herr Mahling, who appeared as the unstable husband. Excellent service was rendered by Fräulein Farkas, Fräulein Naumann, Herr Reer, and Herr Burger; and the ensemble was fairly good.

PHILHARMONIC SOCIETY.

THE great masters have not been uniform in their methods of composition. Schubert dashed off his thoughts and seldom troubled himself to make any corrections. Beethoven made numberless sketches before he seriously planned out a score, and Mendelssohn touched and re-touched his works before they were absolutely to his liking. Dr. Hubert Parry may be said to resemble the last-named composer, for his Symphony in F (No. 3), which was first produced by the Cambridge University Musical Society on June 12, 1883, has been twice subjected to revision, and it was presented in its latest form at the penultimate Philharmonic Concert this season, on May 30. The first three movements have been slightly altered, and an entirely new Finale supplied. This section is in the bluff, hearty English style in which Dr. Parry now excels, and worthily crowns the work. The Symphony was finely interpreted under the composer's direction. Other features of the Concert were Beethoven's Pianoforte Concerto in G (No. 4) and Dvorák's piquant Violin Concerto in A minor (Op. 53), both being beautifully played, the former by Mr. Leonard Borwick and the latter by Mr. Franz Ondricek. Mrs. Henschel sang Handel's air from "Alessandro," "Lusinghe più care," with her usual purity of style.

There were only five pieces in the programme of the last Concert, on the 13th ult., but two of them were novelties. The first was an Overture entitled "Melpomene," by Mr. G. W. Chadwick, who is an American musician, born at Lowell in 1854. He studied in Germany for some time and he evidently knows his Wagner. Mr. Chadwick has written much in various departments of the art, and the present Overture shows that he is an earnest, conscientious musician, with much command of tragic expression, the climax being even powerful. Miss Chaminade's Concert-stück in C sharp and D flat for pianoforte and orchestra is, on the other hand, a bright and lively work, opening with a distinct resemblance to Wagner's Overture to "The Flying Dutchman," and afterwards we are reminded of Liszt and Grieg, so that if Miss Chaminade is not original she is certainly eclectic, and she writes music to which it is pleasant to listen. She played the solo part in her "Concertstück" with delightful touch and fluency. A performance absolutely unsurpassable in any respect was given of Beethoven's Violin Concerto, and Miss Camilla Landi gave an air, "O ma lyre," from Gounod's "Sapho," with much dramatic feeling and voice power; and a splendid performance of Mozart's so-called "Jupiter" Symphony, under Sir Alexander Mackenzie's direction, brought a successful season to a triumphant conclusion.

RICHTER CONCERTS.

THE conductor who, in spite of all rivalry, still remains facile princeps concluded his twenty-fourth series of London Concerts on the 17th ult. Highly as connoisseurs have for long appreciated the magnificent combination of qualities united in the artistic personality of Hans Richter, they have of late found it necessary to place still higher value on his splendid services. Comparisons may be odious, but criticism after all forms its judgments by their aid. English Concert-goers had begun to believe that Hans Richter was but one of quite a number of great conductors to be found abroad: recent events have clearly demonstrated the fallacy of this idea. Three of the greatest have been heard in London within the last three months and their merits have been freely acknowledged in these pages; but the highest compliment we have been able to pay these eminent artists was that, in certain qualities of their work, those which distinguish the conducting of Richter were approached.

All things considered, it is not surprising that Herr Richter should, at all four of the Concerts which constituted his all-too-short season, have been heard at his very best. Being, above all things, human, he could not fail to find stimulation in the present state of London's musical atmosphere. Among the performances which revealed his great qualities with more than usual conspicuousness should be named that of Tschaiakowsky's "Symphonie Pathétique," at the second Concert, on May 27; those of the "Pastoral" Symphony and the "Siegfried Idyll," on the 10th ult., and those of the chief items in the programme of the final Concert, which was exclusively composed of excerpts from the works of Wagner. Tschaiakowsky's noble, picturesque, and moving work received a rendering that intensified the barbaric splendour and passion which were noted as among its prominent characteristics when it was first played, under Sir A. C. Mackenzie, at the Philharmonic Concerts last year. At the same Concert Mr. Borwick gave the first public performance of a new Pianoforte Concerto in G, by Professor Stanford, the slow movement of which at once secured a host of friends by reason of its depth and sincerity of expression and the breadth and dignity of its melodic outline and harmonic progressions. The themes of the first and third movements struck one at first hearing as scarcely worthy the bold handling and undeniably clever treatment to which they are subjected. At the third Concert, on the 10th ult., the novelty was Smetana's Symphonic Poem "Sárka"—third of the set of six entitled "Mein Vaterland," of which Nos. 1 and 2, "Vyšehrad" and "Vltava," have already been given at these Concerts. Like its predecessors this piece has a programme, and captivates by its clearly defined themes, picturesque orchestration, and rhythmic life. The "sensation" of the evening, however, was the performance of Liszt's E flat Concerto by the famous pianist, Herr Moritz Rosenthal, who had not previously been heard in England, and who displayed qualities of brain and finger that went far towards justifying the title "king of pianists" which was recently applied to him by a very great musician. If his interpretation of the great masters be on a par with that which he gave of Liszt's Concerto he will be welcomed in English Concert-rooms as often as he chooses to play in them.

WAGNER CONCERTS.

THE promising qualities shown by Herr Siegfried Wagner, on the occasion of his first appearance here last year, were further exemplified at the Concert given at Queen's Hall under his direction, on the 6th ult., when, besides appealing to his hearers as a conductor, he also came before them for the first time in the capacity of a composer, with a Symphonic Poem founded, as regards its "poetic basis," on Schiller's "Sehnsucht." Though reflecting—as every one anticipated—the styles of his father and grandfather—the latter far more than the former—this work showed a certain amount of natural talent. Some of the themes were not without significance, and the orchestration gave signs of a right perception of the use of tone-colour. There remains the question whether at Concerts of this importance the work of the "prentice han," either in production or interpretation, should be admitted. Speaking for ourselves, the only possible answer is an emphatic negative. "Sehnsucht," and the worst performance of the Overture to "Der Freischütz" it has ever been our misfortune to hear, provoke a hope that Herr Siegfried Wagner will mature his gifts before again submitting them to the fierce light of London criticism.

Herr Mottl directed the Concert given on the 20th ult., at which the pieces for orchestra alone were the two middle movements of the "Harold" Symphony of Berlioz; the "Egmont" Overture, and the Introduction to Act II. of "Ingwilde," an opera in the advanced Wagnerian style, composed by Max Schillings, a young Rhinelander, and produced last November at Karlsruhe. The Introduction is not one of the best portions of the opera, and lost from its dissociation from its proper surroundings. The two pieces by Berlioz were admirably played, but lost much by detachment from their companions. We were not greatly impressed by the performance of the "Egmont" Overture. It was strenuous, and gave effective prominence to details; but it lacked "atmosphere," and its familiar quality of dignity came out with far less force than usual.

Madame Mottl, a soprano, who made her first appearance in England on this occasion, sings with great intelligence and charm. Her voice is fresh and produced after the Italian rather than the German manner. She was heard in solos by Mozart, Berlioz, and Richard Strauss, and with Mr. Bispham in the duet between Eva and Sachs, from "Die Meistersinger." The Concert concluded with the last scene from Act I. of "Parsifal," the solos in which were undertaken by Mr. Bispham, Mrs. Lee, and Mr. L. Pringle. The music for the youths, boys, and knights was well sung by the choir.

NIKISCH CONCERTS.

THE present craze for new conductors is, we presume, responsible for the series of Concerts inaugurated at Queen's Hall, on the 15th ult., by the enterprise of Mr. Daniel Meyer. It is early yet to express a final opinion on the merits of Herr Nikisch as an interpreter of works with which music-lovers have become familiar, because his readings differ in numberless ways from those to which we are accustomed, and such differences, the charm of novelty notwithstanding, come invariably with something of a shock. Herr Nikisch's great reputation abroad having long ago been matter of common knowledge among those who take interest in these things, his audience naturally came prepared to find in him the qualities which distinguish great leaders of men, and they were not disappointed. His baton is employed rather to indicate effects of accent, phrasing, and expression than to beat "time" in the ordinary acceptance of the term, and the way in which its complicated but highly significant suggestions were carried out by the orchestra spoke volumes. The responsiveness of the band—which, by the way, consisted chiefly of English players—was, in every way, quite remarkable. The works played by the orchestra alone were Beethoven's C minor Symphony, Wagner's "Tannhäuser" and Dvorák's "Carnaval" Overtures, and Grieg's "Peer Gynt" Suite (No. 1). In all these the orchestral details stood out in almost every instance with perfect clearness, and the gradations of speed and power gave indications of a mind with the sense of form strongly developed and acting in every case with a consciousness of the end in view. The effect of deliberateness was indeed so strongly felt that, in certain passages, highly charged with emotion, one missed that "glow" which is so necessary when we wish to carry conviction. All good work in art must necessarily come from the head, but it must be made at times to seem to come from the heart, or it leaves us comparatively unmoved. Herr Nikisch did not quite attain this ideal. Mr. Adamowski gave a fine performance of Bruch's G minor Concerto for violin, and Madame Melba sang two songs in her customary finished style.

At the second Concert, on the 22nd ult., Herr Nikisch gave no "new" readings of the works which constituted his programme, and therefore left the mental balance of his listeners undisturbed. On the other hand his interpretations of such works as Schubert's sublimely pathetic "Unfinished" Symphony, Smetana's "Lustspiel" Overture, the "Waldweben," from "Siegfried"; Siegfried's "Journey to the Rhine," from "Götterdämmerung"; and the orchestral part of Mendelssohn's Violin Concerto were quite devoid of distinction. We have plenty of Conductors without a tittle of Mr. Nikisch's reputation who could do as well as this, and several others who can—and are accustomed to—do much better. The soloist in the Concerto was Herr Burmester, whose rendering of the beautiful work was brilliant and clever, but greatly wanting in "poetry." Mr. Nikisch has brought his own oboe player from Buda-Pesth. Until we heard this gentleman we had no idea that so disagreeable a tone could be produced from the instrument.

CRYSTAL PALACE.—"HYMN OF PRAISE."

"MAGNIFICENT!" was the word on all lips when the last chord of the final chorus in the "Lobgesang" had died away on the 22nd ult. at Sydenham. There have been many superb musical demonstrations on the Handel Orchestra, but on this occasion the 3,000 executants were a more homogeneous force than ever. The music is so familiar both to chorallists and instrumentalists in this country that they could probably have rendered it almost equally well without the parts before them. In a letter dated July 21, 1840, the composer speaks of his work as "not a little oratorio," the plan being lyrical rather than dramatic. The "Hymn of Praise" was written for the Gutenberg Festival at Leipzig, on June 25, 1840, in commemoration of the fourth centenary of the invention of printing, and was produced at the Church of St. Thomas, famous in connection with John Sebastian Bach. It was next given at the Birmingham Festival on September 23 in the same year, the principal parts being taken by Miss Birch, Madame Caradori Allan, and Mr. Braham, and it is recorded that the choral, "Let all men praise the Lord," so impressed the audience that they rose with one accord; and this practice is now usually adopted at Festival performances, though no one set the initiative on the occasion now under notice. After a third rendering at Leipzig in October, 1840, the fastidious master set to work to revise his score. The finest additions were "Watchman, will the night soon pass?" followed by a pause, and then by the triumphant cry of the soprano, unaccompanied, "The night is departing," which, as the writer in the programme book at the Crystal Palace justly observes, "has probably moved more hearers and more powerfully than any scene in any similar music." The first performance of the work in its new form took place at Leipzig on December 3, 1840, and it was given by the Sacred Harmonic Society at Exeter Hall, on March 10, 1843. But there is no rashness in asserting that never in the history of "The Hymn of Praise" has it been rendered with such grandeur as at Sydenham at this year's Festival performance. Mr. August Manns must have been truly proud of the splendid force over which he evinced perfect control. Madame Albani, Madame Clara Samuelli, and Mr. Edward Lloyd interpreted the solo parts in a manner that was scarcely open to criticism. In the second part the glorious choir gave the familiar Prayer from Rossini's "Moses in Egypt," and the orchestra gave the concluding movement from Sullivan's "Festival" Te Deum, first performed at the Crystal Palace on May 1, 1872. If the general performance did nothing else, it proved the ever increasing excellence of our English amateur singers.

MR. SARASATE'S CONCERTS.

If these performances have attracted less attention than usual, it is partly due to the demands on the public in an exceptionally busy season and partly because the great artist gave rather hackneyed programmes and did not employ an orchestra, so that the effect of nothing but solos and duets for himself and Madame Berthe Marx (charming pianist though she is) became somewhat monotonous. At the first Concert, on the 1st ult., the two executants gave with perfect finish Bach's Sonata in E, Schubert's Fantasia in C (Op. 159), and Emile Bernard's effective Suite (Op. 34). Madame Marx displayed brilliant execution in Mendelssohn's familiar Fantasia in F sharp minor (Op. 28), and Mr. Sarasate's principal solo was his own Sérénade Andalouse.

At the next performance, on the 8th ult., there were again three duet-sonatas—namely, Bach's in C minor, Schumann's in A minor (Op. 105), and Saint-Saëns's (Op. 75), delightful finish characterising all the performances. The solos for both players were of slight interest. Goldmark's Suite in E for pianoforte and violin (Op. 11) was the principal feature of the third Concert, on the 15th ult. It is a bright work and is evidently a favourite with Mr. Sarasate. So is Raff's "Fée d'Amour" for violin solo, which he played in his best manner. Of the last Concert we must speak next month.

VARIOUS RECITALS.

ONE of the earliest Pianoforte Recitals of which record has to be made this month is that of Madame Augarde, at St. James's Hall, on Monday, May 27. In Bach's "Italian" Concerto, Beethoven's Sonata in A (Op. 101), and pieces by Mendelssohn and Chopin, Madame Augarde gave ample evidence that she is an earnest musician; but that she is a brilliant executant cannot at present be said, her execution being somewhat imperfect.

On the next afternoon, also in St. James's Hall, Mr. Willy Burmester gave his last Violin Recital for the present, his programme being again more calculated to astonish his hearers by his powers as a virtuoso than to secure their homage by his gifts as an artist. He played one movement of a Concerto in A minor by Raff, Wieniawski's ingeniously written Fantasia on themes from Gounod's "Faust," Saint-Saëns's brilliant Rondo Capriccioso—a favourite with Mr. Sarasate—and some of Brahms's Hungarian Dances, displaying executive facility that at times was simply marvellous. Few now alive can remember Paganini in his prime, but it has been suggested that the cloak of the greatest of Italian fiddlers has fallen on the shoulders of Mr. Burmester.

Miss Chaminade, who gave her fourth annual Concert at St. James's Hall, on the 7th ult., formed her programme mainly but not entirely of her own compositions. Mrs. Helen Trust, for example, sang Arne's song "Phyllis," as arranged by Miss Carmichael, and Mr. Ben Davies that favourite air of F. Clay, "I'll sing thee songs of Araby." The rest of the scheme, however, consisted of vocal and instrumental pieces by the Concert-giver, in which Mr. Johannes Wolff and Mr. Mariotti assisted as instrumentalists, and Miss Esther Palliser, Miss Camilla Landi, and Mr. Plançon as vocalists. Among the pieces were two movements from a Pianoforte Trio (No. 2), various songs that have previously been heard, and three new lyrics, "Sur la Plage," "Le Noël des oiseaux," and "Viatique," all well worthy of Miss Chaminade's reputation.

Miss Pauline St. Angelo, a very clever young pianist, gave her second Recital in St. James's Hall, on the 11th ult., giving really impressive performances of Beethoven's Sonata in C sharp minor—commonly termed the "Moonlight" Sonata—and various selections by Chopin, Schubert, Schumann, Rubinstein, Liszt, Henselt, and Moszkowski. Miss St. Angelo will be heard again with pleasure and will receive more attention at a less busy period of the year.

On the 4th ult. Madame Else Mathis gave another Pianoforte Recital in the Queen's (Small) Hall, and as the date happened to coincide with that of the death of Weber in 1826, the choice of the master's beautiful Sonata in

A flat (No. 2) as one of the principal features of the programme was distinctly appropriate. Madame Mathis, who is an excellent teacher as well as a skilful executant, was also heard in pieces by Couperin, Daquin, Haydn, Schumann, and Franz Hullah, the last-named musician being the son of her own preceptor. Mr. Theodore Byard contributed some songs with fair effect.

Miss Janotha's Chopin Memorial Concert at St. James's Hall, on the 21st ult., was largely attended, and the programme was, on the whole, interesting, though confined to, comparatively speaking, minor compositions. The Polish pianist was heard in the recently discovered Nocturne, which, if not written by Chopin, is certainly a clever imitation of his style, and other pieces, and remarkable talent was displayed by a boy violinist, Master Jakoff Hemburg, in Wilhelm's transcription of the Nocturne in D flat. Miss Clara Butt, Miss Ella Russell, and Miss Marie Brema contributed songs, some of which were also transcriptions, as Chopin did not excel in vocal music.

"ALCESTIS" AT BRADFIELD COLLEGE.

MORE than usual completeness and success have distinguished this year's performances of the Greek play at Bradfield College. Much of the former may be attributed to the special appropriateness of the music written for the occasion by Mr. Abdy Williams, now a master of the College; and no little of the latter to the favourable weather. The theatre, carefully modelled after those of ancient Greece, being in the open air, not only necessitates absence of rain, but the representations to have their full effect imperatively demand a brilliant sunshine and a bright blue sky. All these conditions were forthcoming at the opening performance, on the 8th ult., and with slightly varying degree in the following week, during which period the cleverly metamorphosed chalk pit was thrice filled with enthusiastic audiences. The "Antigone" of Sophocles and the "Agamemnon" of Æschylus having been given in previous years, it remained for this occasion to bring forward a work of the third great tragic poet, Euripides. No better choice could have been made than "Alceſtis," whose noble devotion and self-renunciation to save her husband's life places her in a supreme position of honour amongst women. To adequately impersonate this character calls for no small amount of histrionic skill. How sympathetically it was played by Mr. B. Wood-Hill was indicated by the "warm tears" which were found in many eyes after the faithful wife's touching farewell to her husband, Admetus, and her children. The beauty of this sacrifice, like the scent of incense, seemed to hang about the play long after the mournful funeral procession had descended from the stage and wound its way from out the theatre. Dr. H. B. Gray, in his reading of the part of Admetus, strove to represent him, and with distinct success, as the self-centred man who gradually awakes to the full sense of his wife's devotion and of his own selfishness, a sense temporarily obscured during his altercation with his father, Pheres, but stung into life on his return from the funeral at the sight of his desolate home, and by the thought that she whom he had loved was lost to him for ever. In favour of this reading may be urged the fact, sometimes apparently forgotten, that Admetus was a king, which would justify in Greek minds any sacrifice, and the genuineness of his grief and subsequent faithfulness to his wife's memory. There was a dignity about Dr. Gray's gestures and his silent grief over the bier of Alceſtis that was inexpressibly touching, and would have done credit to a professional actor of rank. The difficult part of Hercules was capably sustained by Mr. H. A. Lomas, and Mr. P. A. Koppel deserves very special mention for his most sympathetic "serving woman." Mr. G. H. Hewetson as Pheres, Mr. G. L. Morrell as the "serving man," and Mr. A. H. Gordon and Mr. R. L. Finnis, who respectively appeared as Apollo and Death, all fulfilled their tasks in a manner that indicated lively interest and intelligence, the clearness of their articulation being in particular worthy of praise. The excellent manner in which Mr. C. H. Jones fulfilled the duties of the Coryphæus also demands record.

Great interest was attached to the incidental music owing to its being an avowed attempt to reproduce, as far as tolerable to modern ears, the effects secured by the ancient Greek poets. Mr. Abdy Williams's researches in the much debated subject of Greek music are well known to readers of THE MUSICAL TIMES, and it is therefore unnecessary to repeat his deductions, which were described in the number for April last. According to Plutarch the music of the Greek play was regarded as a seasoning or relish, and was altogether subordinate to the text. No comparison can therefore be made with modern opera. The enharmonic genus, with its quarter-tones, and the various fractions of tones of the chromatic genus, being unavailable, Mr. Williams has adopted in his music the standard diatonic genus and the various transpositions of the "immutable system," practically the modern minor scale in its descending form, which appears to have played an equally important part with the enharmonic and chromatic genera. In an instructive preface the composer, moreover, says that the work of scoring this music has led him to the opinion that the "modes" or "octave species" had more to do with the tuning of the limited number of strings of the lyre and the small number of available holes on the flute than with the nature of the melody. The keys chosen are A minor, with simple modulations to D minor and G minor, and the themes and harmonies are of a studiously simple character, the only harmonic concession to modern taste being the addition of occasional major and minor thirds to the fourths, fifths, major sixths, and sevenths, which Plutarch says were used by "the Ancients." Only eight instruments were employed at Bradfield—four lyres and four flutes, all of which had been especially made for the occasion after ancient models. Each lyre had nine strings, giving the Dorian octave E, F, G, A, B, C, D, E, to which was added a B flat to produce the "conjunct tetrachord." The flutes were practically soft-toned clarinets, being played with a single reed. These had also been specially made by Mr. Blaikley for the performance, and were modelled after those discovered in 1876 at Pompeii, with the exception of the metal sheaths for stopping some of the holes, which were not deemed necessary and much increased the difficulties of the performer. Two of these flutes gave the compass A to F, and the others D to D; as a rule, the two former were silent when the two latter were played, and vice versa. The flutes were mostly used to accompany the chorus in unison, the chords on the lyres being used to accentuate the speech of the actors. With regard to the use of the lyres, a very interesting attempt was made to revive the paracatalogē method invented by Archilochus, in which the verses were spoken in measure to incidental chords sounded upon stringed instruments. It only having been used in the tragedy, Mr. Williams confined its employment to the most pathetic passages of Admetus. The effect may be compared to that produced in modern opera when the actor speaks to an orchestral accompaniment, but the rhythmical divisions of the words by the Greek actor were more precise and calculated, and his voice more nearly approached the singing tone. The most melodic intervals to modern ears in Mr. Williams's music occur in the chorus parts, which were admirably sung. So completely did the music fulfil the purpose of a background, that it is difficult to select any particular number for special praise; but apart from the increase of effect it gave to the despairing and remorseful words of Admetus, it may perhaps be said to have been most impressive in the funeral procession. In this the low wail of the flutes and the accentuating soft chords from the lyres had a peculiarly mournful effect that went far to complete the pathetic effect of the scene. This notice would be incomplete without mention of the series of beautiful pictures, only comparable to those made familiar to us by Mr. Alma Tadema, which from time to time were presented to the audience. The greatest credit should be accorded to Dr. Gray for the patient care and faithful attention to every detail which went so far to reproduce the spirit of ancient days. Seated amidst the trees, with the birds carolling gaily in the bright blue sky, and gazing at the gracefully flowing and soft tinted robes of the actors, it needed but little exercise of the imagination to fancy oneself a subject of ancient Greece, "the mother of arts and eloquence."

RUBINSTEIN'S "CHRISTUS" AT BREMEN.

RUBINSTEIN always objected to the art-form, Oratorio; the masterpieces of this kind left him cold—nay, often positively pained him. He was of opinion that the "grand imposing figures of the Old and New Testaments" should appear on the stage. In fact, he wished to erect a building for the special purpose of "sacred opera." He was well aware of the difficulties of such an undertaking, also of the prejudice against "sacred opera." For years he worked with such an aim, and wrote "Paradise Lost," "Tower of Babel," "Moses," and others, and finally "Christ."

To enter into the question of sacred opera would occupy more space than stands at our command. To discuss the idea of representing on the stage the life, passion, and death of the Saviour would scarcely prove profitable. Public opinion, generally, would condemn it, apart from religious scruples which, so far as they are honest, should be respected. The associations of the theatre, for the most part, are of so worldly a character that the production on the stage of such a work as Rubinstein's "Christus" might well appear distasteful even to the most broad-minded of men. But leaving such questions to those whom they may concern, we would give a brief account of Rubinstein's work, produced at Bremen on May 25, and performed ten times, after which a second shorter series was announced, merely reminding our readers that every attempt was made to present it in a manner worthy of the subject; also that by closing the theatre during the off nights, and by forbidding applause during performance, the performance was distinguished, in marked manner, from that of an ordinary secular opera.

The "Christus" consists of a prologue, seven scenes, and an epilogue.

The prologue has an overture. Four bars in slow time contain a theme which the composer himself entitled the "Messiah" theme. This appears in various forms during the agitated movement which follows, and in which an attempt is made to give a tone-picture of Jewish party strife and of Roman rule during the period immediately preceding the birth of the Saviour. The theme is heard ff and in augmentation over a dominant pedal in the Coda. When the curtain rises the manger, with the village of Bethlehem to the right, is visible. Shepherds are gazing at the bright star shining in the heavens. The music, with its long-held note, syncopated rhythm, and constantly changing harmonies, well expresses an attitude of suspense. Angels are now seen in the heavens, and they sing of the wonderful birth; the music is hymn-like in character. The Three Kings now arrive; one from the South, one from the North, and the third from the East. Each sings of his power and glory, but also of unsatisfied desires. Both they and their followers are surprised to find that the star has guided them to the humble stable. The songs sung by these Kings are interesting, while each is characterised by local colour; the plain, bold strains, for instance, of the Northern monarch contrast in marked manner with the intricate rhythms and ornaments of the music assigned to the Indian King. At length the Child in the manger, together with Mary and Joseph, are seen enveloped in glorious light. The prologue ends with concerted music, in which the Kings, their followers, and the Shepherds take part; heavenly sounds mix, too, with those of earth; the Angels' "Hallelujah" is heard high above the other voices.

The Temptation of Christ forms the subject of the first scene. The music is at first appropriately based on the opening theme of the prologue. The eloquent prayer of Jesus (some of Dr. Bulthaupt's fine lines have been passed over by the composer) is declaimed in dignified tones. But now, dark sinister sounds are heard; Satan is about to tempt the Saviour. The scene is a short one; the difficulty of rising to the height of the great argument would naturally induce a composer to keep within modest bounds. At the close, the orchestra has the last word, and the victory of the powers of good over those of evil is clearly portrayed in the music.

This dark and agitated picture is followed by one bright and peaceful. John the Baptist is standing in front of the flowing Jordan, Peter, James, and John at his feet, and a crowd in front, to whom he is telling of Him who "baptiseth, not with water, but with fire." Jesus now appears, yet is only perceived by John, who, kneeling, salutes him as "the Lamb of God who taketh away the sin of the world." Then follows the baptism of Jesus by John, and the descent of the dove. The music of this section, at first bold, but gradually becoming more subdued, is most appropriate.

The third scene is somewhat longer than the two which precede. At the opening, Jesus is preaching to the multitudes. By the miracle of the loaves and fishes He satisfies their immediate temporal wants; by His words of consolation to the woman whom the Jews would have stoned, He excites their sympathy; and by the raising of the widow's son, their astonishment; so that they sing in joyful tones and proclaim Him King. This scene, with its various moods, naturally lends itself well to musical treatment. The fourth scene takes place at Jerusalem and in the outer Court of the Temple. Jesus, followed by the exulting crowd, arrives and casts out the money changers and the dove sellers. Then comes a very different picture: Caiphias and the high priests appear, and the great Teacher is accused of blasphemy. Here again, in the secular and the sacred elements, the enthusiasm of the followers of the Teacher and the cruel conspiracy of the priests, the author offers effective contrasts of which the composer makes striking use.

Scene the fifth is the quiet, solemn representation of the Last Supper. Then follows, immediately, the hour of mental conflict in the Garden of Gethsemane, and the entry of Judas, who by false kiss betrays his Master.

In scene six Jesus is dragged before Pilate. The angry, surging crowd clamour for His death, the crowd who but lately saluted Him with hosannas. Pilate's Wife intercedes in vain, and the Just One is hurried away to execution. The picture, one of painful excitement, has been intensified by the composer by means of music, at times, strong, and by vivid colouring.

Scene the seventh is that of the Crucifixion. It was not found possible to give it properly on the Bremen stage; hence it was omitted. The scene, with taunting crowd, with angels whispering words of comfort to the dying Saviour, and demons tempting Him to renounce His high mission, is finely conceived by the author of the text; and it seems, so far as one can judge from reading the score, to have called forth the composer's best powers. A motive at the opening—is curiously like the Kundry motive in "Parsifal." The scene closes with Christ's words, "It is finished."

The words are repeated by angels and demons; and then, amid the raging of the elements, the latter, with Satan at their head, sink down, while the former vanish from sight. This would seem to be a fit ending to the work. Dr. Bulthaupt, however, has added an epilogue in which Paul is preaching the gospel. The music of "Christus" scarcely admits of detailed description. In oratorio Rubinstein objected to the stiffness of the forms which always appeared to him in flat contradiction with the drama unfolded in the text. This objection is similar to the one brought by Gluck and Wagner against Italian opera. Rubinstein, however, does not follow the lines indicated by the latter, but merely supports the action by appropriate music, and accentuates the thoughts and feelings to which the words give rise.

The all-important part of Jesus was taken alternately by Dr. Otto Briesemeister and Herr Raimund von Zurmühlen. Only of the latter can we speak; he was dignified throughout, and displayed artistic qualities of a high order. The difficulties and dangers of his task were great, and he passed successfully through the trying ordeal. The four ladies—Frau Iduna Walter-Choinnans (Mary, the Mother of Jesus), Fräulein Louise Mulder (Mary Magdalene), Fräulein Sophie Sedlmair (the Widow of Nain), Fräulein Else Breuer (Pilate's Wife)—all deserve honourable mention. We mention the ladies, but must abstain from further details. Space prevents us giving all the names, and yet all worked well together to produce an artistic and solemn impression. The chorus of over three hundred, composed of ladies and gentlemen who offered their services, was excellent. Dr. Karl Muck, from Berlin, proved an efficient conductor. Dr. Theodor Loewe and Dr. Heinrich Bulthaupt—the one director, the other stage manager—deserve all praise for the manner in which these performances were planned, prepared, and carried out. Dr. Bulthaupt, too, deserves special mention for the text, which, if not in all respects satisfactory, has poetical feeling and imagination. We cannot end this notice without referring to the energy of Dr. Loewe. He was one of Rubinstein's best friends, and two years ago had seriously discussed with the master the question of producing "Christus." The death of Rubinstein, an almost fatal blow to the scheme, since he had promised to conduct the work, did not discourage the worthy director of the Breslau Theatre; on the contrary, it urged him on all the more to carry out his friend's almost last wish. He had, as we have already said, many obstacles to overcome, and may be proud of his success. It is pleasant to learn, as I did from his lips, that the clergy of Bremen not only have made no opposition, but have openly expressed their approval of the "Christus" performances at the Stadt-Theater. Indeed, under the very shadow of the venerable Cathedral did I see an announcement of the performances.

LOWER RHENISH FESTIVAL.

THIS, the greatest of German Festivals, traces its origin to the one held at Erfurt in 1811, under the direction of Dr. Bischoff, one of the earliest and fiercest opponents of Wagner; to his energy and perseverance, however, the present state of prosperity of the musical gatherings held alternately at Cologne, Aix-la-Chapelle, and Düsseldorf is, in a measure, due. From the 2nd to the 4th ult., inclusive, the seventy-second of these Festivals was held in the Gürzenich Hall, Cologne, under the direction of Professor Dr. Franz Wüllner. The programme of the first day commenced with an Overture in D by Handel, consisting of an Introduction and Fugue, a spirited performance which at once displayed the excellence of the orchestra. This was followed by a Te Deum for choir and orchestra, composed by Dr. Wüllner. This work, which has already been heard at Cologne and elsewhere, shows clearly that the composer is master of form, and of the technics of his art; and, moreover, it is effectively written for the voices, and well scored. Yet, in spite of its many sterling qualities, the Te Deum is not a masterpiece of the first rank; in it, inspiration does not always go hand in hand with intelligence. It seems, therefore, somewhat strange that such a prominent place should have been assigned to it. The work was vigorously sung by the choir, which contains voices of fine, sympathetic quality, although the high notes of the sopranos and also of the tenors were not altogether pleasing. The worthy Professor was much applauded at the close. This was followed by Haydn's "Seasons," an oratorio introduced at this Festival many, many years ago. The work is very old, and, in places, very old-fashioned, and to hear the whole of it is somewhat of a trial of patience. It has four sections, each complete in itself, and two of these would surely have sufficed to represent the worthy old master. Or why not have left Haydn to a more convenient season, and have offered a work more in accordance with the modern spirit? For instance, one number from Max Bruch's oratorio "Moses" was given on the last day of the Festival. It is almost as difficult to judge of an oratorio from one number, as of a house from one of its bricks. Here, then, at the end of this first programme seemed a suitable place for a part, if not the whole, of Max Bruch's work. The solo singers in the "Seasons" were Madame Semblich, who sang with grace and delicacy, and whose beautiful voice gave much pleasure; and Herren Birrenkoven and R. Kaufmann—the latter of whom is known to London audiences—who, at any rate, in the matter of voice, were far less successful. The orchestral accompaniments, throughout, were played with the utmost refinement.

On Monday evening the Concert commenced with Bach's cantata "Wir danken Dir, Gott," for soli, chorus, and orchestra, in which the beautiful soprano aria, "Gedenk' an uns mit Deiner Liebe" was well sung by Fräulein Johanna Nathan. The performance, generally, was good, with exception of the high trumpet notes, which were not pleasant to listen to. Next came Mozart's Symphony in E flat, a triumph for both band and conductor. It was a beautifully pure, unaffected reading. Where all was so good, it is dangerous to select one movement for special mention; and yet we would award the palm to the Andante. The third part of Schumann's "Faust" proved another victory for the choir. Of the principal solo vocalists we would particularly name Fräulein C. Huhn. The concluding scene from "Parsifal" followed. Herr Perron gave an intelligent rendering of the part of Amfortas, but neither his voice nor that of Herr Birrenkoven (Parsifal) was in sufficiently good order to enable one to appreciate to the full the greatness of the music. Welcome was the half-hour's pause, for there was still the "Eroica" to complete the programme. And a magnificent performance it was! There is nothing new to say about the work, and the praises of the conductor have already been sung in these columns. Dr. Wüllner can render justice to all the Symphonies of Beethoven, but his conceptions of the "Eroica" and C minor seem to us his finest.

On the third and last day of the Festival there were plenty of good things, but two special attractions. The one was the performance of Heine's "Pilgerfahrt nach Kevelaar" by Humperdinck. This short work, written for tenor and contralto soli, chorus, and orchestra, is delightfully fresh. The music shows the influence of Schumann rather than that of Wagner. The instrumental writing is clever and the orchestral colouring admirable; the fluttering of flags, the effect of the miraculous cure on the lame and other sick folk, the peaceful sleep of the sick boy—these and other details of the poem are depicted in realistic, yet by no means extravagant, fashion. The soloists were Fräulein Huhn and Herr W. Birrenkoven. The composer, who was present, was called to the platform at the close of the performance. The second special attraction was the pianist, Eugen d'Albert, who played Weber's "Concertstück" and Liszt's Concerto in E flat. He has a sympathetic touch, is perfect master of the keyboard, and plays with feeling and marked intelligence. In Germany he is justly regarded as one of the greatest of living pianists. He was received with tremendous enthusiasm; the audience tried hard for an encore, but D'Albert positively declined to gratify its wish. The encore nuisance would soon disappear if all artists holding high position were to act in a similar manner.

The Lobgesang, for soli, chorus, and orchestra, from Max Bruch's "Moses"; the Vorspiel and "Narration of Peace" from Richard Strauss's "Guntram," and an aria from Schubert's Easter cantata "Lazarus" were included in the programme. The former is full of vigour; the second, though extremely clever, is steeped in Wagner. The Schubert, too, failed of its effect. Excerpts, even from familiar works, are unsatisfactory; still more so from unfamiliar ones. It is, indeed, almost impossible for a critic to render justice to music thus presented. Fräulein C. Huhn sang some Lieder of Robert Franz with very great refinement. The rendering of Brahms's Third Symphony in F and Mendelssohn's "Midsummer Night's Dream" Overture was extremely fine. The Concert concluded with Hans Sachs's Address and the closing chorus from "Die Meistersinger." The Festival orchestra, consisting of 144 members, included, besides the Gürzenich orchestra, which already enjoys considerable fame, picked players from all parts of Germany. The body of tone of the strings (101) was superb. Dr. Wüllner is an able conductor, but it is only right to mention the artists who enabled him to produce such excellent results. This brief résumé of the Festival will show that the three days at Cologne were profitably spent; it is well sometimes to see how they manage such things abroad.

A "CHRISTUS" SYMPHONY AT GHENT.

A SYMPHONIE Mystique, entitled "Christus," by Mons. Adolphe Samuel, the eminent director of the Royal Conservatoire of Ghent, was performed at the Casino of that city, on Sunday afternoon, the 9th ult. In our present issue will be found an account of Rubinstein's "Christus." The idea of impersonating the Saviour on the stage offends many—I may, indeed, mention that to Mons. Samuel himself it is repugnant—but to take advantage of an art which makes such strong and direct appeal to the emotions to illustrate and intensify the story of Christ's sufferings and of His tragic death is certainly legitimate. The subject has been frequently treated in oratorio form: Handel, Bach, Graun, Beethoven, Gounod, Kiel, Liszt are names which at once present themselves to the memory; Mendelssohn, indeed, commenced a "Christus," but did not live to complete it. Mons. Samuel, like Beethoven in his Ninth Symphony, has summoned voices to his aid; they are employed in the last three divisions of the work. "Christus" opens with a movement bearing the superscription "Nazareth," which contains many characteristic themes and clever developments. The Annunciation forms the subject-matter of the first section; in the second, the Shepherds and Magi occupy our attention. The whole movement is attractive; the melodies or themes are full of charm, which is enhanced by the masterly orchestration. The second movement, "Au désert de Juda: Le mont de la tentation," is impressive. It contains two themes of special moment, in that they refer to Christ Himself; the one stands as symbol of His authority, the other, of His suffering. The movement, indeed, opens with the former, which is powerfully proclaimed by brass instruments; the latter, as will readily be understood, is employed with fullest effect in the Passion. The "Authority" motive, of stern, almost menacing character, despite the various modifications which it undergoes in the course of the work, is always easy of recognition. The next movement, "Scènes de l'Apostolat," opens with a lively theme descriptive of the common folk crowding to Jesus to hear the blessed words which fell from His lips. The Pharisees are represented by a theme which, with its halting rhythm and lurid harmonies, well depicts the evil, jealous spirit by which they were possessed; its downward progression, too, stands in curious contrast to the upward tendency of the Christ and other motives. The voices enter towards the close of this movement; and here, again, we have another striking contrast. The music hitherto has been very modern in character; the vocal music is, however, based on old ecclesiastical themes: a "Pueri hebraorum," a Benedictus, and an Alleluia; the subject is the triumphal entry of the Master into Jerusalem. This Coda is of imposing effect. The fourth movement, "La Passion," is a tone-picture of dark colour; the fierce "Crucifige" of the angry crowd, sung by the choir, though almost painful in its realism, is full of movement, and, from a purely musical point of view, is welcome after the slow, serious strains which have preceded. The "Tristis est anima sua," another ecclesiastical theme, whether intoned by the voices or played in the orchestra, forms one of the most marked features of the movement; it is unutterably sad, and, even without words, speaks its own meaning. The last number is choral: it bears the title "Advenit Regnum Dei." Here again ecclesiastical themes are employed; and together with them two mystic themes. The music is full of dignity and power; the quiet Amen brings the work to an effective close.

Such is the brief outline of the Symphony, which occupies about two hours in performance. It is evidently the outcome of religious feeling. The music, with a knowledge of the chief themes, may be easily followed; a study of the score would, however, show what skillful and elaborate use was made of them. It is difficult to pronounce judgment on the symphony in the matter of individuality. The general scheme is original, but there is a strong Wagner vein running through the work; and, again, there is much letter to master before one can enter fully into the spirit of the music. Of the composer's noble aim and high achievement there is, however, no question.

The work was ably performed under the direction of the veteran composer, and it was received by the large audience with enthusiasm. The orchestral playing and choral singing were excellent. The symphony, we understand, is to be given at Cologne during the coming winter.

A GRAND OLD MUSICIAN.

(FROM A CORRESPONDENT.)

COPENHAGEN was en fête for the best part of a week, from May 14 to 19, to celebrate the ninetieth birthday of Johan Peter Emil Hartmann—"old Hartmann" as he is called here with affectionate familiarity, and no wonder. For more than half-a-century he has played the organ at the Church of Our Lady, with the hand of a master, to the edification of generations of its congregations. Years since he won the heart of his countrymen by his truly popular operas, and gained the national ear by songs redolent of the soil. Numberless pupils have been formed under his guidance at the Royal Conservatorium, of which he is the Principal, and he is the idol of academic youth, over whose choral society he presided for many years, and who regard this vigorous old man, who still actively joins in daily exercises at the Gymnasium, as the very type of a grand old Norseman of the Sagas. Thus, the festivities—of a more or less homely and intimate description at all times in this little country—assumed, in a special degree, the character of a family celebration of which the nonagenarian musician, surrounded by his children and their progeny—constituting in themselves an appreciable portion of the populace—formed the centre. The King of Denmark, accompanied by the Crown Prince, personally called upon the veteran composer to offer his congratulations and to confer upon him the Grand Cross of the Danebrog Order, set in brilliants; while His Majesty's daughter, the Princess of Wales, conveyed by telegram her best wishes to her old music master. The town, including the royal castle, was gay with flags and festoons; there was a procession of some hundreds of musicians from all parts of the country to the composer's residence, and many other demonstrations. In the evening a gala performance took place, at the opera house, of "Little Kirsten," one of Hartmann's most popular early operas; the entire audience, from the King and royal family downwards, rising to their feet upon the appearance in his box of the composer, who was deeply moved, and at the conclusion of the performance addressed a few words of thanks to those present. On the succeeding days, performances of Hartmann's works were given by the Musikforeningen, the Cæcilforeningen, and other musical societies, and a marble bust of the composer was unveiled in the hall of the Students' Society, at the conclusion of which latter ceremony the young undergraduates, availing themselves of their ancient privilege of extravagant enthusiasm, took the horses out of his carriage, and thus conveyed him in triumph to his home.

Hartmann's compositions are but little known outside his native country, which he himself has scarcely ever left. Once, in his younger days, he visited Germany for purposes of study, on which occasion he made the acquaintance of Spohr, in Cassel, who received the young Danish musician with much cordiality, and, in 1838, had one of his symphonies performed in that town; but there is no evidence of his having come in contact with any other of the great masters of his time. Appointed, as long ago as 1840, to the post of Principal of the Royal Conservatorium, and acknowledged a representative musician at home, he pursued the even course of his life. With his old instructor, Christoph Weise, and Peter Heise, the co-founders of a Scandinavian school of music, whence the younger masters, Gade, Lindblad, his own son Emil, Svendsen, Grieg, and many others have emanated. The late Niels Gade, so much better known in England, with whom he at one time shared the honours bestowed by his country, was Hartmann's son-in-law, and allied to him, moreover, by ties of the closest friendship. As vigorous still in mind as he is in body, it is only the other day, we are told, that he put his signature to an important new work. May it be permitted to us to express the wish that he may long continue in the enjoyment of these priceless gifts, and to join our tribute of regard with that so freely rendered by his countrymen to the Nestor of European composers.

ROYAL ACADEMY OF MUSIC.

At the Concert given by the students of the Royal Academy of Music, in St. James's Hall, on the 17th ult., the most important of the new compositions was a String Quartet by Mr. J. B. McEwen, the chief feature in which was a pleasing and original Intermezzo. The Quartet was played by Miss E. E. Byford, Messrs. W. H. Reed, Vernon Addison, and C. H. Allen Gill. Mr. A. Walenn sang a cleverly written and agreeable setting of "Ca' the yowes to the knowes," by Mr. Harold Macpherson; and Mr. B. H. Wallis sang two songs by Mr. Christopher Wilson, set to words of Whyte Melville and Lord Lytton, which displayed considerable originality and feeling. Miss Lily West played Chopin's Sonata in B flat minor and Miss Marian Jay two movements of Mendelssohn's Violin Concerto, both students exhibiting much ability. Two movements of Brahms's B flat Sextet and a Suite by Fuchs were played by members of the ensemble class.

The competition for the Maas Memorial Prize took place on the 22nd ult., and the prize was awarded to Gwilym Richards.

Mr. W. G. Wood has been elected a Fellow of the Royal Academy of Music.

Mr. Reginald Steggall has been appointed Professor of the Organ at the Royal Academy of Music.

ROYAL ACADEMY OF MUSIC.—LECTURES.

MR. F. CORDER, at his fourth Lecture on Composition, returned to the subject of melody. After remarking that although at present it was difficult for us to dissociate melody from relation to a key-note and attendant harmony, the lecturer said it was not so very long ago since it existed apart from both. The definition of melody being a succession of notes was not sufficient, since, if it were so, the arrangement of the keyboard could be called a melody. The growth of the Prize song in the "Meistersinger" was shown by comparing Hans Sachs's instructions to Walther, with the expanded form in which it was finally sung by the hero. Almost the only possible means of extension from primitive form was by repetition of portions of the melody. The trained musician thoroughly knew all the methods available. Where then did inspiration come in? Again, no melodic phrase had any character of its own. It was said certain phrases were martial, because they employed the only intervals obtainable from a trumpet, and the trumpet was associated with war. But the same phrase was equally suggestive of a post horn and the peaceful occupants of a coach. Every possible musical phrase had been used for every possible association, and every phrase had been used to suggest opposite sentiments. The opening melodic phrase of Mendelssohn's "Wedding March" was found symbolising the most opposed associations in the "Walküre," a song by Lassen, and in "Pagliacci." Therefore, it was not the melody itself, but its surroundings; in other words, the way in which it was dressed up. It followed, therefore, that the effect was produced not by the idea, but in the art displayed in its use. Transformation of themes (the method pursued by Liszt and Berlioz) was the most artificial of all means. Wagner's system was based upon the transmutation of themes. Counterpoint was the art of combining one melody with another. But unless the melodies were conceived simultaneously the result would never be good. The avoidance of cadences was largely effected by deft use of counterpoint, one theme being commenced just as the other was ending. The best illustration of this was found in canon. The executants of the examples at this Lecture were Mr. G. Walenn (violinist), Miss Amy Sargent, and Mr. J. W. Foster, the last two singing the duet "You and I," a remarkably ingenious specimen of a canon in the seventh from Mr. Corder's opera "Nordisa."

At the concluding Lecture, delivered on the 5th ult., the subject was Harmony, which Mr. Corder said might be called the colouring or complexion of music. The study of harmony was to music what grammar was to language. Harmony was regarded by students as a dry subject, but only by its mastery could intimate acquaintance with music and the power to write it correctly be gained. Music could be enjoyed by all, but its comprehension could only be acquired by great and cumbrous pains. Harmony probably arose from the accidental jangling of two parts intended to be sung in unison, but it would not have become an art until definite duration of sounds had been arrived at. In early written music the harmony might still be termed accidental, being caused by the progression at independent parts. Afterwards it became diatonic, and subsequently chromatic. Monteverde might be termed the founder of the homophonic style—i.e., in which all the parts merely acted as accompaniment to the melody. The Abbé Vogler was the pioneer in harmonic colouring. Spohr helped it forward by his frequent use of the diminished seventh, Chopin by his constant changes of harmony, and Wagner by his masterly employment of dissonances. One of the earliest harmonic resources was the use of pedal notes, exemplified in the bagpipes. The repetition of a certain series of notes, known as a ground bass, was also at one time a favourite device, and one much used by Purcell. The well-known lament of Dido in "Dido and Æneas" was built upon a ground bass extending over five bars. To show the effect that harmony had on the expression of melody, the lecturer harmonised our National Anthem in the minor mode and played examples from Grieg. In conclusion, Mr. Corder expressed the hope that his remarks had shown his listeners that to attribute failure in their musical studies to want of special gifts was the refuge of the idle; that the greatest composers had only succeeded in producing their masterpieces after much study and sustained effort—in many instances, as in the case of Beethoven, extending over a long period; and that to attribute their success to inspiration was to insult them. It was only by hard work that capabilities could be brought to maturity, and how great these might be no one could tell. The ugly little orchid root might, by the exercise of patience and nourishment, bring forth a flower that should be the wonder of the world.

ROYAL COLLEGE OF MUSIC.

THREE Chamber Concerts have been given at the above flourishing Institution since the beginning of the new term, but we can only notice some of the performances. At the first Concert, on May 29, the ensemble pieces were Dvorák's String Quartet in E flat (Op. 51) and Schumann's Trio in D minor (Op. 63). Both were carefully and intelligently played, the former by Miss Otie Chew, Mr. Thomas Jeavans, Mr. Ernest Tomlinson, and Miss Ethel Uhlhorn-Zillhardt; while in the Trio, the last-named was joined by Miss Gertrude King and Miss Ruth Howell, as pianist and violinist respectively. Miss Howell was heard in the slow movement from Spohr's Sixth Violin Concerto, which she played tunefully and with chaste expression. Mr. George H. Crampton essayed the Prologue from "Pagliacci," and Miss Clementine Pierpoint sang an impressive setting, by Ries, of a lyric from Von Redwitz's "Amaranth," including the lines beginning "Es muss was Wunderbares sein," which Liszt has set to matchless music. The Concert of the 12th ult. opened with Brahms's Violin and Pianoforte Sonata in D minor (Op. 108), ably interpreted by Misses Howell and Ada Walter; and Misses Rosina and Beatrice Cerasoli played Schumann's lovely Variations for two pianofortes (Op. 46) in a highly creditable manner, the ensemble, execution, and expression being remarkable in such young pupils. The four students mentioned above in connection with Dvorák's work were the performers of one of Mozart's Quartets (in D minor) at the Concert of the 19th ult., and Miss Katharine Sims, Miss Marie Motto, Mr. Ernest Tomlinson, and Miss Uhlhorn-Zillhardt gave a very fair rendering of Brahms's Pianoforte Quartet in C minor (Op. 60), with the famous and wonderfully beautiful Andante in E. Miss Ena Bedford and Mr. Albert Archdeacon sang songs by Gounod and Brahms respectively.

NONCONFORMIST CHOIR UNION.

THE seventh annual Festival, at the Crystal Palace, of this Association, held on the 15th ult., was in every way as successful as its predecessors. In the choir contest Emanuel Congregational Church, East Dulwich, under Mr. J. W. Lewis, won in class A (from twenty-six to forty voices) for the third time in succession, and therefore the challenge banner presented by Mrs. Minshall became absolutely the property of this choir; whilst in Class B (from sixteen to twenty-five voices) the Hatherlow Congregational proved the victors. Dr. E. J. Hopkins was the judge. An excellent selection of anthems, part-songs, &c., interspersed by solos, formed the programme of the Concert on the Handel Orchestra, by over 4,000 adult singers, conducted by Mr. E. Minshall. The singers, representing nearly 150 London and provincial choirs, afforded proof of careful training in all that constitutes creditable choral work. Commendable watchfulness, no less than spirit and confidence, marked their rendering of Spohr's melodious cantata "God, Thou art great," of Bates's effective unaccompanied anthem "I will lay me down in peace," of Mendelssohn's "O come, let us worship," of Bruce Steane's ably written thanksgiving anthem "Great is the Lord," of the two compositions that gained the prizes offered by the Union last year (G. H. Ely's "All Thy works shall praise Thee" and Emlen Evans's "How sweet the moonlight sleeps"), and of Ciro Pinsuti's elegant "A Spring Song." Some orchestral pieces were steadily rendered under the baton of Mr. T. R. Croger. Mr. Arthur Briscoe was at the organ; and vocal solos were contributed by Miss Emily Davies, Miss Edith Hands, and Mr. Maldwyn Humphreys.

LONDON SUNDAY SCHOOL CHOIR.

ADHERING to the commendable rule adopted of late years, the Council of this Association decided upon giving two Concerts on the Handel Orchestra at the annual Festival, held at the Crystal Palace on the 10th ult., these being, of course, in addition to miscellaneous musical performances. This plan enables a host of juveniles to join in the proceedings, whilst the selected vocalists who subsequently appear are no longer condemned to sing the catchy little pieces chiefly composed for children. More than 5,000 members of the junior choir assembled, under the conductorship of Mr. J. Rowley (Mr. Horace G. Holmes being at the organ), and sang with much brightness of tone and style simple sacred effusions. But it was not until they reached the secular songs with taking burthens and interpolated effects, such as the ringing of tiny bells, that the listeners waxed enthusiastic. There can be no doubt of the great popularity of the junior choir at these meetings. The pieces chosen for the 4,000 selected voices were of a better class than we can recall at any preceding Festival, although the silly prejudice against the introduction of an "Ave Maria" necessitated the omission of Henry Smart's melodious four-part song. Choruses from the "Creation" and "Solomon" furnished evidence that the elder branch of the choir is moving in the right direction, and it is quite possible that the performance of Dr. Warwick Jordan's Festival "Te Deum" was intended to test the wisdom of a demand for more elaborate compositions than it has been the custom to offer. If so, the Council must have received encouragement to proceed farther next year. Woodward's impressive anthem "The sun shall be no more thy light by day," Hiles's "Blessed are the merciful," and the trio "At eventide it shall be light," from Gaul's "The Holy City," were also among the compositions in which the chorists specially distinguished themselves. Mr. Luther Hinton conducted with unflinching judgment and decision, and Miss Annie Laundry was at the organ. The Crystal Palace and London Sunday School orchestras combined in the performance of the Overture to "Prometheus" and of other pieces, with Mr. David M. Davis as Conductor.

MUSIC TRADES EXHIBITION.

THERE was much to be learnt by a visit to the Music Trades Exhibition, which was opened on the 13th ult., at the Agricultural Hall, Islington. A comprehensive collection has been made of modern instruments, in which pianofortes occupy an important place, and the elements of construction are displayed to the uninitiated in bewildering multiplicity. Of the novelties may be mentioned Messrs. Erard's resonator, a simple and ingenious device whereby increased richness of tone is imparted to their pianofortes.

Messrs. Schrieber exhibit another form of resonator for the household instrument, and Messrs. Ascherberg show an electrical pianoforte, which entirely obviates all necessity for practice by playing itself. Students of a lethargic temperament may be recommended to try Messrs. Lipp's instrument, which gives the excruciating a stimulating series of galvanic shocks. It is calculated to impart an energetic staccato touch. A musical scale clock, designed and invented by Signor Dreschi, and described as "a logical connection of musical with horological systems," requires study for its due appreciation. Organists may derive useful information concerning their instruments and the means of providing them with the breath of life. To many visitors, however, the most interesting feature of the exhibition has been the series of musical competitions, in which prizes of considerable value have been offered to and won by candidates in all branches of the art. The prizes were distributed on the 21st ult. by Madame Adelina Patti.

MUSICAL ASSOCIATION.

AN instructive and suggestive paper, entitled "The trumpet as an orchestral instrument," was read on the 11th ult., before a well attended meeting of the Musical Association, by Mr. Walter Morrow, the reputation which this gentleman enjoys as an executant on this important orchestral instrument giving much weight to his remarks. After briefly referring to the origin of the trumpet and its early forms, some of which were exhibited, the lecturer passed to the sixteenth century, when he said the length of the trumpet had been increased to eight feet. These instruments had a mouthpiece and a cylindrical tube about three-eighths of an inch in diameter, with two bends, forming three lengths placed triangularly, the last, fifteen inches long, gradually widening to a diameter of four inches in the shape of a bell. Trumpets were first used in orchestras about 1607, and from that time trumpet playing gradually improved until a high standard of excellence was attained, especially in Germany, where a guild of trumpet players was established. Judging from the trumpet parts written by Purcell, Bach, and Handel, early trumpets would appear to have been made in the key of D. To modern musicians accustomed to correct intonation it might seem incredible that the parts were ever played in those days, but there was abundant evidence to show that they were performed, and on the plain D trumpet, but probably with all the attendant imperfections of intonation. During the latter half of the eighteenth century many developments in trumpet-making took place, the length of the tubes being in some instances shortened and additional tubing, called "crooks," applied, the aim being to enable composers to use the trumpet in various keys. Finally, an Englishman named John Hyde conceived the idea of adding a slide to the trumpet, after the manner of the trombone. About the year 1814 the piston as applied to brass instruments was invented by a Silesian named Blümel, and a contemporary Saxon, named Stöbzel, invented the cylinder, the result in each case being the same. The many unavoidable acute angles in the valve trumpet caused deterioration in the tone, and for this reason the slide trumpet was held in greater favour in England. The cornet-à-piston appeared about 1832. It was a small trumpet, about fifty-four inches in length, furnished with three pistons, and giving the natural harmonics of B flat. It quickly became popular, and, owing to its greater facility of manipulation, had caused the trumpet proper to become almost obsolete. The characteristic trumpet tone could, however, not be obtained from it owing to the shortness of its tube. Students would find great benefit from practising on the trumpet. A good trumpet player could always be a good cornet player, but a good cornet player could not play the trumpet without much practice. A trumpet should not be played with a cornet mouthpiece, which destroyed the tone of the instrument and flattened the upper notes. The so-called "Bach trumpet" was a straight trumpet, nearly five feet in length, furnished with two pistons. It therefore corresponded to the cornet in A. It was not intended to supplant the real trumpet, but was constructed to play the high notes written by Bach, which other trumpets had failed to do for upwards of 150 years. The lecturer gave a graphic account of his endeavours to ascertain the secret of Herr Kosleck's trumpet playing on the occasion of the Festival performance of Bach's Mass in B minor, given by the Bach Choir at the Albert Hall, and concluded by giving some practical hints to young composers. The interest of the lecture was materially increased by the series of examples played by Mr. Morrow on various instruments illustrative of his remarks. These included excerpts from classical works played on an old D trumpet and on a species of trumpet written for by Bach under the names of "Tromba da tirarsi" and "Clarino"; and by Gluck in his opera "Orfeo." In the latter example Mr. Morrow received the able assistance of three members of the "Trombone Concert Quartet."

The paper was followed by a lengthy discussion, Professor Prout, who occupied the chair, contributing many interesting remarks. Mr. Blandford also spoke with evident knowledge of the subject, maintaining that the old masters well knew the capabilities of the instruments for which they wrote, adding that it was only modern composers who displayed ignorance in this respect.

DR. PARRY'S "JOB" AT SALISBURY.

THE Test Valley Musical Society, which is fortunate enough to have the Rev. E. H. Moberly at its head, increased the debt of gratitude already due to it from the amateurs of this district by producing Dr. Hubert Parry's Oratorio "Job," for the first time within the radius of Wiltshire and Hampshire, at the Concert given at the County Hall, Salisbury, on the 19th ult. Since the production of this great work at the Gloucester Festival in 1892, it has gradually won its way into public favour; not, as some would have it, in spite of, but by reason of, its unconventional picturesqueness and startling originality. Dr. Parry has written nothing finer than this Oratorio, and as a remarkable exhibition of sustained power it has been surpassed by few composers of any period. The performance by the Test Valley Society naturally excited the interest of music-lovers to an exceptional degree, and, as was to be expected, attracted a very large audience. "Job," with its numberless changes of time, rhythm, and mood, is a work which demands patient and arduous study even from the most experienced executants, and we are awarding Mr. Moberly and his forces very great praise in saying that their rendering of the Oratorio was a highly meritorious one. The singing of the choir was worthy of special commendation. The most difficult passages were attacked with confidence and never-failing correctness, which can only result from careful training; and there was no flagging—no hesitation from first to last. The long chorus in the final scene, with its splendid climax, "Then shall God also confess that thine own right hand hath saved thee," was a supreme effort, and created a profound impression. Of the solo vocalists, Mr. Daniel Price, who took the place of Mr. W. H. Brereton, absent through indisposition, carried off the honours by his fine declamatory singing in that wonderful "Lamentation," one of the most remarkable features of the Oratorio. Miss Hilda Parry took the part of the Shepherd Boy, and Mr. Herbert Grover and Mr. John Morley sang the music of Satan and the Narrator respectively. The orchestra (led by Mr. Foley), unfortunately an incomplete one, was excellent as far as it went, and the Rev. E. H. Moberly conducted with his usual clearness and sound judgment. The Oratorio was followed by a violin solo, well played by Miss Agnes Baker; and the Concert concluded with a Serenade by Robert Fuchs (Op. 51) for the somewhat unusual combination of string orchestra and two horns. We must not omit mention of the name of Miss Ethel Awdry, who did good service as pianoforte accompanist. The Concert was repeated on the following day at the Guildhall, Winchester.

DR. SWINNERTON HEAP has been appointed Conductor of the Birmingham Festival Choral Society in place of Mr. Stockley. Dr. Heap, who succeeded Sir Arthur Sullivan as Mendelssohn Scholar, has for a long time past resided at Birmingham, and was for many years Conductor of the Wolverhampton and North Stafford Musical Festivals and of the Stoke-on-Trent and Walsall Philharmonic Societies.

REVIEWS.

The Church of England Hymnal. Edited by the Rev. C. Bell, D.D., Rector of Cheltenham and Hon. Canon of Carlisle, and the Rev. H. E. Fox, M.A., Vicar of St. Nicholas', Durham. The music edited by A. H. Mann, Mus. Doc., Oxon., Organist of King's College, Cambridge.

[Hodder and Stoughton.]

WE confess to have given way to a gasp on seeing upon our table yet another hymn book, a collection of what the compilers call "Distinctive Evangelical Hymns," such as appears to them to be still needed. No doubt the collection is meant to be strictly, uncompromisingly, eclectic, encouraging by what it includes, warning by what it refuses to admit. Professedly we are presented with the pure, unadulterated, unsophisticated, residuum of Evangelical Hymns, after all the dross is burnt away; and the book, which we are relieved to find of some bulk, considering the principles of its compilation, calls itself "The Church of England Hymnal." But does it faithfully and adequately represent the mind and teaching of the Church of England? It is impossible to allow that it does. It is sectional in tone and thought, not comprehensive, and while it deserves commendation, so far as it embodies the simple manly spirit which characterises Protestantism, and avoids "the unauthorised," and, we will take leave to add, often well-nigh nauseating, "use of epithets of endearment," there are too many of the signs that in the fear of leaving some tares, the risk of rooting up the wheat has not been sufficiently attended to. Rigid indeed must be the Puritan temper which keeps out such priceless gifts to the Christian Church as "Lead, kindly Light," or "Praise to the Holiest in the height." We notice one of Caswall's hymns, "Days and moments quickly flying," but as "altered by several compilers." Not that in this ill-advised particularism the Evangelicals stand alone. There is something almost pathetic in the unflinching appearance, in their compositions of whatever kind, of the cut and dried phraseology, like the common form in a law deed, which has the look of a "caveat," but from which all real operative vitality and meaning have long since departed. But one comes across precisely the same cant, for cant it is, elsewhere. Phrases, phrases, posturing on paper according to current fashion, playing at mediaevalism, sensuous imagery, dry-as-dust statements of doctrine which limits to itself the grand name of Catholic, and the spirit of man, unfed, unedified, because there is no life in the assemblage of icily regular words. There is great need, and perhaps the time has come, for a true "Church of England Hymnal," such as is already in contemplation; but the foundations of such a book should be laid deep and wide if it is to have enduring spiritual value. Christian in tone it should be, in the highest, amplest sense of the word, reflecting also all that is strongest and most nervous in the English character, which tolerates indeed, but has scant respect for, the passing fancy, the youthful arrogance, which flutters limply on the surface of society, but does not touch or sway the nation. Catholic in teaching it should be, and that in the fullest sense, not in that which, with wearisome iteration, is so often foisted upon the Church. While the mind of man exists, there will be deep-seated divergence of opinion, and attraction to this or that side of Christian truth; but we shall never get the right kind of Hymnal until we learn respect for the just prepossessions of others, and refrain from insisting on having our own way in the matter, under the convenient name of "conscience." What would be thought of a man who refused to read, or admit into his house, the 23rd Psalm, because it was bound up in the same book with the 109th? The fact is, the compilation of a really comprehensive hymn book, which shall take hold of the heart of the English Church, is an important and far-reaching subject, insignificant as it may seem to the flippant and the indifferent. The compilers must be saturated with the true (not the official) evangelical spirit, and must have something of poetic fire and insight. Why have Charles Wesley and John Keble kept the affection of English Churchmen? Because they were "Low" or "High"? No. Because they were spiritual poets, and as such teach and reach men, and will reach them while the language lives in which they wrote. It will be seen that while we have but little objection to the hymn book before us, granting the narrow sectional attitude it professedly takes up, we have absolutely no sympathy with its aim. Comprehension, not exclusion, is among the healthiest notes of the age; and to give comprehension a wholesome character is worthy of all effort. With respect to the tunes, the name of Dr. Mann, of King's College, Cambridge, is a sufficient guarantee that what has been preserved, and what has been newly composed, is of merit. We are confident that new tunes contributed by such writers as Sir G. Elvey, Sir R. Stewart, Sir John Stainer, Dr. Bridge, Dr. Hopkins, Dr. Martin, and Dr. Garrett will ere long pass into general use, although probably not always in connection with the very hymns for which they were originally composed. What a blessing to the Church it is that hymn tunes are independent of theological niceties—that is to say, if one is sufficiently educated to follow the growth of Art, and shake oneself free from the swaddling clothes of its infancy!

The Parish Choir Book. Nos. 174-185.

[Novello, Ewer and Co.]

THE Athanasian Creed is so lengthy that Church musicians generally adopt a chant form, and Mr. W. T. Best's setting is no exception to the general rule. On the contrary, it is of the simplest character, and being in D minor finishes with a cadence in D major in the olden style. All the rest of the present issue of a very serviceable publication are settings of the Magnificat and Nunc dimittis, showing how greatly musical versions of the Evening Canticles are now in demand. The first, in G, by A. H. Stevens, if not elaborate, is essentially modern in its harmonies, and yet easy. The next, in E flat, by Sir Joseph Barnby, is more ambitious and quite suitable for festival use. Coming from such a source, it is of course full of musicianly touches and extremely expressive. No. 177, by Henry Gadsby, is a quiet setting in ordinary four-part harmony, evidently intended for general use. No. 178, by the Rev. E. V. Hall, is another version suggestive of festival occasions, and solo voices are required. This and the next (by Percy E. Hughes) are both in the key of D. Mr. Hughes's Service presents no distinctive features, but is smoothly written in the ordinary style of English Church music. We fail to perceive why the word "remembering" should be pronounced "rememb'ring," but any intelligent choirmaster can easily divide the word into its proper syllables. No. 180, in E flat, by Battison Haynes, is full throughout, and is written in a solid, dignified Church style. The next, in C, by J. Varley Roberts, is perhaps rather more vigorous, but in general respects of similar calibre. No. 182, in F, by Bruce Steane, includes a Vesper Hymn, "Lord, keep us safe this night," to be sung, kneeling, after the Blessing. The music is simple and devotional. Considerably more pretentious is No. 183 (E flat), by King Hall, a fine setting with striking harmonic progressions, but without any need for solo voices. No. 184, in A, by G. C. Martin, was composed for the Festival of Sion College Choral Union in 1877, and is therefore appropriately jubilant in character. Solo voices may be employed, but are not indispensable. No. 185, in C, by Thomas Adams, is simpler than many of the foregoing, the voice parts being in unison with the exception of one brief passage. But it is noteworthy for vigour of manner, and the accompaniment looks very effective.

Four Irish Ballads: (1) Maureen; (2) The Maid of Garryowen; (3) The Irish Reel; (4) Lonesome. The words written by Francis A. Fahy. The music composed by Alicia Adelaide Needham. [Novello, Ewer and Co.]

THESE are four capital songs, and in several respects a distinct improvement on those by the same composer noticed in a recent issue. The melodies of the voice parts are more spontaneous, the accompaniments easier and more "pianistic," and the rhythms more strongly marked. Mr. Fahy's lyrics are exceptionally good, and Mrs. Needham has not only caught their spirit admirably, but has also reproduced the characteristics of Irish melodies in a very happy manner. The rollicking, swinging tune of "Maureen," with its jovial chorus, should secure for it immediate popularity, especially as the words are genuinely humorous and the accompaniment offers no difficulty. Of a similar type is "The Irish Reel," which is also provided with an appropriately spirited refrain. Numbers 2 and 4 strike a different chord, but the composer deals as effectively with sentiment as with humour, and fresh, tuneful, expressive, and artistic songs are the result. This set of Ballads should secure for Mrs. Needham an enviable position amongst native song writers.

Six Bagatelles. For Violin and Pianoforte. By Siegfried Jacoby.

Morceaux de Salon. For Violin and Pianoforte. By Oliver King (Op. 91).

[Novello, Ewer and Co.]

BOTH these books may be warmly recommended to violin players for music in the home. The "Six Bagatelles" are by no means trifles in worth, but are instinct with vitality and pleasing sentiment. They consist of an effective "Gavotte," an expressive "Intermezzo," a graceful "Canzona," a sprightly "Tarantelle," a "Mazurka," in which the peculiar rhythm of this dance is well caught, and a "Study," which would make an effective piece. Not the least merit of these compositions in the opinion of many will doubtless be the facility with which they can be played by executants of moderate abilities.

If Mr. King's pieces make more demands on the player, the increased difficulty is recompensed by greater effect. It may be added, however, that the chief difficulties occur in the pianoforte parts, but these could be read by an average performer at sight—a task rendered much easier by the beautifully clear manner in which the music is printed. The volume contains twelve pieces of varied character, and all possessing more or less musical interest. A Nocturne in G minor has a wistful expression that makes it peculiarly attractive. A "Sérénade Orientale" is an effective piece, the same may be said of a "Danse Hongroise," and pleasing fancy, well expressed, characterise a "Romance," "Albumbblatt," and "Chant d'Espoir."

Ten Songs. Words by H. Heine and Emanuel Geibel, and English translations by D. H. Composed by Dorothea Hollins. [Stanley Lucas.]

THESE songs bear the stamp of having been written by a refined and accomplished musician. Much loving care has apparently been bestowed upon them, and the accompaniments display ingenuity and tasteful fancy. Cultured vocalists will find much pleasure derivable from this collection. It should be added that the vocal part is chiefly designed for voices of medium compass.

FOREIGN NOTES.

AMSTERDAM.—A Musical Festival of a distinctly national type is to be held here in September next, when non-choral works by Belgian composers only will be performed exclusively by native artists. A musical festival without choral forces would seem to be somewhat of an anomaly!

M. Daniel de Lange has been appointed to the Directorship of the Conservatorium and that of the Society "Tot Bevordering der Toonkunst," upon the retirement, on account of old age, of M. Franz Coenen.

BERLIN.—A monument in memory of the late Dr. Philipp Spitta was unveiled in the cemetery of the Apostles' Church, on May 22. The Hochschule für Musik, in which the distinguished writer took so deep an interest, was largely represented, Dr. Joachim taking a prominent part in the proceedings, and delivering a pathetic and appropriate address. In its course he alluded to the labours of Spitta in connection with Bach's music, as well as with that of the older German masters, and referred to the recent Bach Festival given in London as being in exact accordance with Spitta's views. An anthem, composed for the occasion by Herr von Herzogenberg, and a motet of Heinrich Schütz were sung under Dr. Joachim's conductorship. The monument contains a portrait in the form of a bronze medallion, the work of the sculptor Hildebrand.—Just previous to the adjournment, on the 1st ult., for the usual summer vacation, the directors of the Royal Opera brought out a new three-act opera, "Frauenlob," the hero of which is the semi-legendary Minnesinger and reputed founder of a school of Meistersingers at Mayence known by that name. The composer, Herr Reinhold Becker, has reason to be satisfied with the reception accorded by the audience to his certainly picturesque work, a satisfaction which, however, has been somewhat marred by the pen of the critic who, speaking collectively, looks upon the new work as possessing but an ephemeral value. Qui vivra, verra. Upon the resumption of performances, next month, there will be a revival of "Hans Heiling" and "Der Vampyr," to signalise the occurrence, on August 16, of the birth centenary of Heinrich Marschner, while, later on, the first production here of Berlioz's "Benvenuto Cellini" is promised, as well as that of a new four-act opera, by Herr Philipp Rüfer, entitled "Ingo."

BOLOGNA.—Schumann's "Faust" music was produced recently, for the first time in Italy, at the Teatro Comunale, under the able direction of the Maestro Martucci. The performance, which is described as an excellent one, was heard by a highly appreciative audience, the scenes of the third part more especially creating a profound impression.

—A "dramatic legend," entitled "Las Monjas de Sant Ayman," by the young composer Angel Guinara, has been brought out with much success at the Novedades Theatre.

CARLSRUHE.—The sixth annual Musical Festival of the Grand Duchy of Baden, held here on the 2nd and 3rd ult., was a great success, members of different choral societies, to the number of 6,000, taking part in the performances.

DARMSTADT.—We are requested to state that Mr. Carl Fuchs, whom we referred to under this heading in our April number as a "late pupil" of the Royal Manchester College, has been, as a matter of fact, a Professor of that Institution since its foundation.

DESSAU.—At the instigation of the hereditary Prince of Anhalt-Dessau, a Wagner enthusiast par excellence, the small Court Theatre in Ballenstedt is about to undergo important structural alterations, after the Bayreuth model, with a view to the special performance here of Wagnerian music-dramas by eminent artists and before specially invited audiences.

DÜSSELDORF.—An excellent precedent has been established in the first People's Musical Festival held here on May 20, by the Düsseldorf Gesang-Verein, under the direction of its able Conductor, Herr C. Steinhauer, and with noted vocalists for the solo parts, when a model performance of Haydn's "Creation" was offered to an audience which filled every part of the spacious Tonhalle. Admission was at the uniform price of sixpence, which included the neatly printed booklet of the Oratorio—a truly popular and meritorious undertaking.

FLORENCE.—A posthumous opera in four acts, entitled "Eros," by Nicolo Massa, the successful composer of the operas "Il Conte di Châtillon" and "Salammbô," was recently brought out at the Pagliano Theatre. The libretto, sketched by the eminent singer, Madame Gemma Bellincioni, has been elaborated by Signor Enrico Giosicani, the well-known librettist. The work, the score of which is described as presenting many interesting features, especially in its orchestration, was well received.

GMUNDEN.—There is to be a season of opera at this favourite watering-place during the summer, under the direction of Herr Cavar, who has engaged a very efficient company, and with the co-operation of Madame Pauline Lucca, the famous prima donna (who will act as stage manager, and has placed some of her most promising pupils at the disposal of the undertaking). The répertoire will include "Hänsel und Gretel," "The Barber of Seville," and "The Daughter of the Regiment."

GOtha.—A number of interesting letters written by Spohr and Andreas Romberg, during their respective tenures of the Capellmeistership in this town, have just been discovered in official archives here by Dr. Hodermann, the meritorious author of a history of the Gotha Theatre.

LEIPZIG.—Professor Reinecke, who last month entered upon his seventy-second year, will, it is understood, shortly retire from the conductorship of the famous Gewandhaus Concerts, which he has held for thirty-five years, his predecessor in the office having been Julius Rietz, who himself succeeded Mendelssohn.

LISBON.—There has been—cosa rarissima in this little capital—a series of three Concerts of chamber-music given lately in the Salon of the San Carlos Theatre by excellent native artists, Senhores Rey Colaça, V. Hussla, Selfredo Gazul, and Cunha Silva. The programmes included numbers by Beethoven, Mozart, Brahms, Mendelssohn, Grieg, and Saint-Saëns. There is some probability of these Concerts being permanently established.—Augusto Machado, the successful composer of an opera, "Laurina," has written a "Hymno-Marcha" for the forthcoming Festival of St. Antonio.

MADRID.—A new zarzuela, "El Señor Baron," the words by Frederico Jaques, the music by Zabala, has been brought out recently with marked success at the Eslava Theatre. Both the libretto and its musical setting are characterised as being charming.

MALINES.—Edgar Tinel, the composer of the oratorio "Franciscus," which has been received with so much favour in Germany, has just completed a new work of the same order, entitled "Sainte Godelive," which is to be first produced at Brussels in the autumn.

MILAN.—A new one-act opera, of the "Cavalleria Rusticana" type, entitled "La Sagra di Valpereta," has been brought out here with considerable success. The music, while not distinguished by any particular originality of ideas, is said to exhibit the true dramatic instinct and a certain elemental grandeur of expression. The composer is Signor F. Brunetto.—A new opera, "Fortunio," by the Neapolitan Maestro, Nicolo van Westerhout, was recently brought out at the Teatro Lirico Internazionale. The work is described as being of musicianlike workmanship, but wanting in inspiration, and the composer having been recalled about ten times only, its success, gauged by the standard of the country, must be described as distinctly moderate.

MUNICH.—Preparations are going forward for a three-days' Musical Festival, to take place in October next, in connection with the inauguration of a new concert-hall to be called the "Kaim-Saal," capable of accommodating some four thousand persons. Some of the leading South German choral societies and distinguished artists are to take part in the proceedings, the programme of which has not yet been determined upon.—The directors of the Hof-Theater have accepted for performance, next season, what is called by the composer, Professor Heinrich Zoellner, a "Wardology," comprising the twin operatic works, entitled respectively "Der Ueberfall" ("The Surprise") and "Bei Sedan," and superscribed "Aus dem Jahre, 1870." The Munich Hof-Theater is a Royal Institution, and can afford to ignore the susceptibilities of the numerous French visitors to the Bavarian capital.—Herr Richard Strauss has just completed a new symphonic poem entitled "Till Eulenspiegel." The work was originally conceived as a comic opera, but eventually took its present form. It will be interesting to hear how the humorous legendary personage has been musically delineated by Herr Strauss.

PARIS.—Fairly-operas being just now in vogue, M. Massenet is engaged upon a new work on the story of "Cinderella," for which M. Henri Cain has furnished the libretto. Madame Augusta Holmès is likewise occupied with a work of this kind, on the subject of the "Sleeping Beauty."

St. PETERSBURG.—With the special sanction of the Czar, subscriptions are being raised throughout the empire, by the Russian Philharmonic Society, towards the foundation of a "Rubinstein Fund," to be administered for the benefit of talented students at the different national music schools. In addition to this worthy practical memorial, a monument is to be erected to the Slavonic master in the courtyard of the newly built Royal Conservatoire in this capital.

STOCKHOLM.—Humperdinck's "Hänsel und Gretel" was performed at the Royal Theatre for the first time on May 24, in the Swedish language, with enormous success.

STRASSBURG.—A monument to Victor Nessler, the popular Alsatian composer, was unveiled here, on May 26, with appropriate ceremonies, the occasion being marked, moreover, by performances at the Municipal Theatre of "Der Rattenfänger von Hameln," "Der Trompeter von Säckingen," and two of Nessler's less known early operas. The realisation of the monument is due chiefly to the exertions of the Leipzig "Sängerkreis," whose Conductor Nessler was for a number of years.

VIENNA.—The appointment is announced of Herr Richard von Perger to the conductorship of the Philharmonic Society's (Gesellschaft der Musikfreunde) Concerts during the coming season. Herr von Perger, a native Austrian, has given proof of his qualifications for the important office in his capacity of Conductor and Principal of the Conservatorium at Rotterdam.—The fiftieth birthday of the composer, Thomas Koschat, is to be celebrated next month at Klagenfurt, where a number of choral societies, with the Vienna Maennergesang-Verein at their head, will be assembled on musical ovations intent.—The directors of the Philharmonic Society, at their recent periodical meeting, have decided to celebrate, by a series of musical performances on a large scale, the birth centenary of Franz Schubert, which occurs in 1897.—The late Franz von Suppé has left the nearly completed score of an operetta which is to be finished by a competent hand, and will be mounted by Director Janner for the opening performance at the new Carl-Theater.—Carl Mayerhöfer, the famous basso of the Imperial Opera, has just retired into private life, after forty-one years' connection with that establishment. His splendid voice and rare dramatic powers will be remembered by many London opera-goers.

WEIMAR.—The announcement has been made of the appointment of Herr Bernhard Stavenhagen as Conductor at the Court Theatre, in conjunction with Herr Eugen d'Albert. The celebrated pianist made his début in his new position last month with an ably conducted performance of "Tannhäuser."—A musical Festival will be held here from September 29 to October 1, when works by Bach, Beethoven, and Brahms will form the principal features.

ZURICH.—The famous old Tonhalle, familiar to periodical visitors to this town, has just closed its doors for ever, after a solemn performance of Handel's "The Messiah." But le roi est mort, vive le roi!—the new Tonhalle, erected on the Alpine Quay, is to be inaugurated in October next, with musical festivities extending over three days.

MUSIC IN BIRMINGHAM.

(FROM OUR OWN CORRESPONDENT.)

OUR musical season is virtually over, and was brought to a close by some operatic performances given at the Theatre Royal by the Royal Carl Rosa Opera Company. Although several works that have not been heard here before were submitted to local judgment, the attendance was far from what the artistic excellence of the performances would have led one to expect. The works alluded to included Humperdinck's "Hänsel and Gretel" and Sir Arthur Sullivan's "Ivanhoe." Wagner's "Tannhäuser," which two years ago drew the largest and most enthusiastic assembly ever known to the Theatre Royal, is still the favourite opera with local audiences, and was given twice, once with Mdlle. Marie Duma and once with Mdlle. Pauline L'Allemand in the part of Elizabeth. Bizet's "Carmen" was produced with Miss Agnes Janson in the title rôle, who made her first appearance on this occasion with the Royal Carl Rosa Opera Company. Her portrayal lacks the grace and charm of Marie Roze and Zélie de Lussan, but, on the other hand, she is essentially womanly, passionate and wilful—in fact, a true Carmen of the people.

The Musical Matinées in connection with the Royal Society of Artists, under the direction of Mr. Oscar Pollack, were brought to a close on the 8th ult., and proved the most successful series since the organisation has been started.

An event of considerable importance, which has given rise to a great deal of speculation in musical circles, has been the election of a new Conductor to the Birmingham Festival Choral Society, in succession to Mr. W. C. Stockley, who, after forty years' assiduous service as chorus-master and conductor, has severed his connection with the Society. His resignation has given rise to a correspondence in our daily papers between Mr. Stockley and the committee which was not altogether of a pleasant character, and which ought never to have been made public. Eleven candidates presented themselves for the vacant post, but only three were nominated—namely, Dr. C. Swinnerton Heap (Birmingham), Mr. A. J. Cotton (Birmingham), and Dr. R. Rogers (Bangor). The election by ballot was effected a week later, and resulted in Dr. Heap being elected by 279 votes. Mr. A. J. Cotton withdrew his name in favour of Dr. Heap. At the subsequent meeting of the Society, Dr. Heap, the new Conductor, was formally introduced to the members. The Chairman, Mr. J. Dale, in his speech, congratulated the Festival Choral Society on the choice they had made, and said that on such an occasion, though their thoughts were naturally directed to the future, they could not altogether forget the past. They remembered how that Society, from very small beginnings, had become one of the most important choral societies in the United Kingdom. Much of its success was due, undoubtedly, to the enthusiasm of the members; but very much also was due, as they ungrudgingly admitted, to the great talents, energy, perseverance, kindness, courtesy, and ability of their late esteemed Conductor. Their gratitude, unfortunately, they were prevented, by causes for which they were not to blame, from showing in a more practical form; but they could not be prevented from feeling it. They hoped that the time would yet come when the little temporary cloud which had covered their parting with their old Conductor—a parting which should have been a golden sunset—would have passed away. Dr. Heap, who was received with loud applause and cheering, said that it was like coming home again, for he commenced his musical career in that Society when he was about eight years of age. He also paid a high tribute to his predecessor, who had made the Society a body of chorallists second to none.

MUSIC IN BRISTOL.

(FROM OUR OWN CORRESPONDENT.)

THERE has been little music in Bristol during the past month, only two events having taken place worthy of record. The Choral Society of St. John's, Clifton, brought forward Niels Gade's cantata "The Erl-King's Daughter" and Mendelssohn's "Lorelei" at its twelfth annual Concert, on May 28, and, assisted by an orchestral band, composed almost entirely of amateurs, the body of vocalists unfolded the beauties of the works with a degree of excellence above their customary standard. Miss Marion Harris, Miss Ellen Gath, and Mr. W. Thomas were the principal vocalists. Hatton's glee "Beware," in which Messrs. W. D. Merrell, S. Bennett, J. H. Bown, and E. C. King were associated; songs, contributed by Mrs. Kenway and Mr. E. T. Gough; a violin solo, played by Miss Maud Riseley; and Mendelssohn's "Athalie" Overture, the ballet music from Gounod's "Faust," and Gung'l's "Amoretten Tanze" Valse for the orchestra were agreeable features of the programme. Mr. A. E. Hill was the Conductor.

On the 6th ult. St. Stephen's choir, considerably augmented, and joined by an orchestral band, gave a representation of Gaul's "The Holy City" in the ancient and beautiful City Church. Miss Maude Rennie Powell, Miss Alice Brooks, Miss Barton, and Mr. W. H. Wickes, the chief soloists, sang their parts with expression and effect, and the choral numbers were given with unity and precision. Mr. Paul Barclay conducted.

The weekly performances by Mr. Webb's band, at the Zoological Gardens, are good, and thoroughly appreciated by those who attend them.

MUSIC IN CAMBRIDGE.

(FROM OUR OWN CORRESPONDENT.)

THE term now at an end has not presented any features of extraordinary musical interest, but many excellent Concerts have been given, which have been but ill supported by the public.

On May 2 we had a visit from the Ladies' Orchestra, who made a highly favourable impression. Perhaps their best effort was in an entr'acte from Reinecke's "King Manfred." In this piece their gradations of tone were excellently managed, and the whole performance reflected the utmost credit on their Conductor, Mr. J. S. Liddle. The Cambridge University Musical Society gave a Chamber Concert, on May 16, when Mrs. Liddle, Miss Florence Hemmings, and Miss Marie Wurm gave trios by Brahms and Dvorák in an admirable manner. At the Orchestral and Choral Concert of the same Society, the "Spectre's Bride" was the main attraction. Dvorák's masterpiece was given in excellent style. Mrs. Hutchinson, Mr. Branscombe, and Mr. Andrew Black were admirable soloists. The programme also included the "Unfinished" Symphony and the Overture to "Oberon." Mr. Burnett was leader and Dr. Gray conducted.

The Cambridge University Musical Club gave a most successful "open" Concert in the Hall of Caius College, at which Schubert's Octet was the principal piece.

Dr. Mann's Choir has given two Concerts. At the first, "Blest Pair of Sirens" and various madrigals were excellently sung. At the second, in King's Chapel, on the 12th ult., the programme consisted of the "Hymn of Praise" and the "Rock of Ages" (Bridge).

College Concerts have been too numerous to describe. The programme at St. John's included Hofmann's "Fair Melusine"; that at Christ's, a new ballad by Dr. Gray, consisting of a setting of Kingsley's "Lorraine Lorraine," and at Caius, Gernsheim's "Salamis." Organ Recitals have been given at Trinity by Mr. E. H. Lemare, Mr. T. Noble, Mr. H. P. Allen, and Dr. Gray.

MUSIC IN EAST ANGLIA.

THE musical season in Norwich may be said to have closed on May 30, when the Ladies' Orchestral Society gave its seventh annual Concert, with every sign of healthy life and vigour. Under Mr. Noverre's careful training this Society has made considerable progress towards thorough efficiency, and whatever works are selected, the greatest pains and trouble are given to their preparation. No other Society in the district can boast of such a fine body of amateur strings as this Society, but the wind department at present has to be imported from the metropolis. The Concert opened with Mendelssohn's "Italian" Symphony, a choice showing evidence of an ambition which was amply justified, for the work (the third movement was wisely omitted) went remarkably well. Other pieces were the Overtures to "Zampa" and "Coriolanus," Massenet's "Crépuscule," and Sullivan's "Graceful Dance." Instrumental solos were brilliantly played by Miss Amy Flood-Porter (violinello) and Miss Beatrice Pettit (cornet). The vocalists were Mdle. Sylvia Rita, Miss Amy Young, and Mrs. Boyle Smith.

Following a custom inaugurated several years since by the Dean and Chapter of Norwich Cathedral, of having special services now and again for the performance of oratorios within that building, Haydn's "Creation," Parts I. and II., was given on the evening of the 18th ult., the usual Cathedral choir being supplemented by that from the Church of St. Michael, at Coslany, under Mr. Newnam. Dr. Bates, the Cathedral organist, conducted what proved to be a very efficient rendering of a work always grateful to the ear. The solos were entrusted to Master White, Mr. Hemmings, Mr. W. N. Smith, Mr. Brockbank (lay clerks), and the Rev. Precator Thomas, the accompaniments being played by a small but efficient band led by Mr. F. W. B. Noverre. Mr. C. H. Duffield did good service at the organ.

In St. Michael-at-Thorn Schoolroom, on the 11th ult., Mr. C. H. Duffield gave an interesting series of biographical, historical, and musical sketches of English and German composers of the eighteenth and nineteenth centuries. Illustrations were contributed by Miss Stannard, Miss Gazeley, Mr. S. Hemmings, Mr. Munns, and Mr. D. Underhill.

The season at Lowestoft was inaugurated, on the 1st ult., by the first of the series of Concerts to be given in the Pier Concert-room during the summer months, under the direction of Dr. Bunnett. In addition to the last-named gentleman, Miss Lilian Redfern, Mr. W. Acfield, Mr. J. H. Brockbank, and Mr. W. Tuddenham (violin) took part. The occasion was signalised by the first performance of an opera, "The Holly Branch," composed by Harriet Young, with libretto by Charles Thomas. Only two characters being required, the plot is necessarily of the slightest; however, the music is particularly bright and fresh. Miss Redfern and Mr. Acfield acted and sang the parts admirably.

MUSIC IN GLASGOW.

(FROM OUR OWN CORRESPONDENT.)

THE Music School in connection with the Glasgow Athenæum continues to flourish amazingly well. The school is, indeed, the largest organisation of its kind in the provinces, and ample evidence on this point was forthcoming on the afternoon of the 7th ult., when the fifth annual report was read by Mr. Allan Macbeth, the popular principal, in the presence of a large audience. From this interesting document we gather that at the close of last session the number of students reached a total of 1,595. Not only in numbers had the success of previous sessions been maintained, but the artistic standard of the work done was remarkably high. Both Mr. Carl Reinecke, of Liverpool, and Dr. Crow, of Ripon Cathedral, were retained as examiners, and these gentlemen testify, in turn, to the "general excellence of the work," to the "remarkably small failures," and to expectations being "abundantly realised." The report further referred to the extraordinary run upon the monthly Concerts, to the success which attended the performances of Gounod's "Mirella" and Boieldieu's "La Dame Blanche" by the members of the opera class, and to the valuable labours of Mr. Kosman in connection with the Chamber-music classes. During the afternoon there was some excellent music by the students, one of whom, by the way, Mr. Walter Harvey, has been engaged by Mr. Hedmont for five years as one of the leading baritones of his Opera Company—the "National Opera Company," as it is to be called.

On the 12th ult. an agreeable function took place in the Grand Hotel, when Mr. V. H. Zavertal was presented with an address from the Glasgow Society of Musicians on the occasion of his departure for Bohemia, his native land. Mr. Julius Seligmann, who presided over a large and representative company of musicians and associates, spoke with his usual felicity, alluding in happy style to the esteem in which the aged guest of the afternoon had been held for a long period of years in Glasgow and neighbourhood. Mr. Zavertal, it may be mentioned, is the father of the accomplished Conductor of the Royal Artillery Band.

Of late the attendances at the band performances in the various public parks in and around Glasgow have been enormous. Where all is so good it might be deemed invidious to single out any particular band for distinction. Suffice it, then, to say that not only are the programmes invariably popular, but that the audiences follow with keen interest the artistic merits of each of the bands.

The accounts in connection with last season's Choral and Orchestral Concerts show a deficit to the extent of £5,743 14s., a sufficiently large amount, it must be admitted. Still, many folks had looked for even a larger loss. Of the sum just mentioned the guarantors lose £1,325, and a call of 13s. 6d. per pound has, therefore, been made. It has been officially intimated that the Festival Executive Committee have withdrawn from further co-operation with the Scottish Orchestra Company in the meantime, and that no further appeal to guarantors will be made to carry on the joint-scheme.

MUSIC IN LIVERPOOL.

(FROM OUR OWN CORRESPONDENT.)

THE past month has been bare—even almost of promise—in regard to musical matters in this district. Choral and orchestral societies which closed their latest season three months ago have been lying absolutely dormant, and not even a whisper has been heard of what may be expected at their hands the same period hence. The Philharmonic Society will give the usual twelve Concerts, but no details are yet made public, and it is expected that the Harrison series, Schiever Quartet Afternoons, and so forth, will all progress as usual.

The chief departure in regard to the future is that proposed by the Sunday Society, under the auspices of which, if fitting arrangements can be made with the City Council, there will be double the number of musical performances in 1895-96 as compared with previous seasons. The bulk of these will take place in St. George's Hall and will be mainly orchestral, extending from October to March. In this connection it may be noted that the musical director of this Society, Mr. W. I. Argent, was, a month or so ago, called before a Committee of the House of Lords to give his views on the question of Sunday music, and his remarks when published may possibly prove interesting reading to those who desire to draw a hard and fast line between the sacred and secular in art, though the matter has been pretty well thrashed out already from time to time in these columns.

The success of the new Wednesday evening entertainment scheme is, it would seem, now secured, more than enough subscribers having entered to guarantee the financial safety of the venture. A sketch of the programme only has been given, but it is evident that good music is not to be lost sight of in the promised series of performances. The chief place in this respect is held by Mr. Rodewald and his Liverpool Orchestral Society.

Another place of resort for the people has been found in the re-opening of the new "Grand" Opera House—formerly the ill-fated Colosseum—where light opera seems to have met with a large amount of acceptance by audiences not hitherto supposed to be educated up to an appreciation of anything above the level of a Concert-hall song. Sullivan's "Chieftain" has been given at the Court Theatre with success. The Alexandra Opera House remains closed, the Prince of Wales's Theatre has also suspended performances for the summer months, and the Carl Rosa house will shortly do the same.

Among the Organ Recitals given at St. George's Hall during the month we may mention those given by Mr. Westlake Morgan, on the 15th ult., and notably those by Miss Edroff, on the 8th ult. The young lady has studied solely with Mr. Henry Clark, the Principal of the London Organ School, and was the first lady to play on the fine organ in St. George's Hall. Her success at both afternoon and evening Recitals was most distinct, and her reception very gratifying.

Mr. H. S. Welsing gave an excellent paper and Recital devoted to Chopin and his works, on the 20th ult., at the Music School. The latter Institution is being crowded out of its present premises and on the look-out for another building.

MUSIC IN THE SOUTHERN COUNTIES.

AFTERNOON and evening Concerts were given by the Bitterne Choral Society, Southampton, on May 29, Gaul's cantata "Israel in the Wilderness" furnishing the chief part of the programme on each occasion. The Bitterne Society was assisted by a contingent of the St. Matthew's Choral Society, and a capable orchestra, drawn from the Philharmonic, the Test Valley, and the Southampton Orchestral Societies, accompanied the work. The solo vocalists were Miss N. C. Newton-Spicer, Mr. M. G. Conlan, and Mr. Sidney Kendall, and Mr. T. H. Bowen conducted. The cantata, which was heard for the first time in the county, was well performed throughout. An Organ Recital was given at St. Mary's Church on Thursday, the 13th ult., by Dr. S. Corbett, Organist of Holy Trinity, Bournemouth. Mr. M. G. Conlan was the vocalist.

The twentieth annual Festival of the Andover Church Choral Union took place at St. Mary's Church, Andover, on Thursday, May 30, when a combined chorus of over 200 voices was formed from the various choirs in the neighbourhood. The Service was Garrett in F, with processional and recessional hymns, and the anthem was "O gladsome Light," from Sullivan's "Golden Legend." Mr. J. W. Chuter conducted the Festival, and Mr. G. H. Westbury was at the organ.

Van Bree's cantata "St. Cecilia's Day" was successfully given by the St. John's Choral Society, Bournemouth, on May 28, under the conductorship of Mr. William Lee. The solos were sung by Miss Wood, and Miss E. Briggs was the accompanist. The second part of the programme was of a miscellaneous character, and included some well rendered part-songs by the members of the Society.

Upwards of 500 singers took part in the Festival of the Bournemouth Church Choral Union, which was held at the Priory Church, Christchurch, on Thursday, the 13th ult. The music used was that arranged by the Committee of the Diocesan Choral Association, and the singing of the large body of voices was remarkable for unanimity and clearness. The conductor was Mr. A. W. Russe, and Mr. E. Precey, Organist of the Priory Church, presided at the organ.

Mr. Dan Godfrey's Military and String Band still continues to exercise its attractions at the Winter Gardens, and among the special engagements during last month we may note that of Mr. Bantock Pierpoint and that of Mr. Charles Fry with Miss Olive Kennett, who introduced several of the new musical recitations by Mr. Stanley Hawley; these, together with the spirited duologues given by the two reciters, were received with much favour.

MUSIC IN AMERICA.

THE serious doings of the musical season of 1894-95 are now fairly over, and the most of what may be chronicled for the next four months will concern those artistic efforts which have for their main object the whiling away of idle summer evenings. The only thing in the shape of opera which holds a New York stage at present is "The Trizane," at Abbey's Theatre—a work which passes for, but is not, opera bouffe. The subject is one of Russian gipsy life, and the music is from the pen of Mr. Reginald de Koven. It is more in the nature of a spectacular drama with incidental music than anything else, and since the composer has been obliged to work with the capabilities and due exploiting of Miss Lillian Russell, the leading lady, constantly in view, it can scarcely be said that the result has been especially noteworthy. Mr. de Koven puts rather more technical skill into his music than the average composer of light opera, and one of the Finales, in which he employs the Russian national anthem, has made something of a sensation, though as a matter of fact the stately hymn is absurdly out of place amid its surroundings.

There has been in the past some very good music to be heard at certain of the biggest of the American seaside resorts, notably at Manhattan and Brighton Beaches. At the former the daily Concerts of Gilmore's military band were a feature for many years, and since the death of that enterprising leader his mantle has fallen upon Mr. John Philip Sousa, who, with a larger and better band, gives his audiences programmes of a rather higher order. This year Mr. Sousa has been again engaged for the season at Manhattan, but will have to divide the honours with a burlesque company which will perform in the auditorium on the beach, which has been fitted up and enlarged for the purpose. Sousa's band is probably the most popular organisation of the kind this country has ever seen. It is in such constant demand that it travels from Maine to California, giving, it is said, between 500 and 600 Concerts annually—a phenomenal record, when one considers the great distances to be traversed and the amount of time consequently lost between "stands."

Sufficient announcements have been made to show that next winter's season of grand opera in New York will be well up to the standard which Messrs. Abbey and Grau have set for themselves.

There is a movement on foot towards instituting a season of grand opera in Philadelphia next winter, at the Academy of Music, under the direction of Mr. Gustav Hinrichs. Heretofore the Quaker city has contented itself with the operatic crumbs that have fallen from the New York table, and these have not, always been the most plentiful or the best. The management will require a guarantee fund of 50,000 dollars before undertaking the enterprise, of which, at last accounts, about 30,000 dollars had been subscribed. A choir change of some importance which has just been effected in Philadelphia is the appointment of Mr. Lacy Batler as choirmaster at St. James's Church, which is one of the three wealthiest and most influential parishes in the city. Mr. James M. Dickinson will remain at the organ of St. James's, where he has served for many years. Mr. Batler was, we believe, for a time organist at one of the English chapels in Italy.

The financial collapse of the New York Casino is a severe blow to light opera, of which it has been the home ever since it was built. Mr. Arousau managed it with ability and good judgment, and, speaking generally, the entertainment given there has been of the best of its kind. The pretty little Moorish building on Broadway was the first one built here with a "roof garden"—a feature which has since been much copied elsewhere. This roof garden was so arranged that one could sit on what was practically a wide balcony in the open air, and witness the performance going on below, while enjoying full liberty to lounge about, smoke, or consume the iced food and drink which is so indispensable here on the hot midsummer nights. After the close of the regular performance the orchestra came up to the roof and extended the programme for another hour. This feature gave the Casino a great popularity, and enabled it to run straight along through the summer to good houses when every other theatre in the city was closed. Mr. Arousau's enterprise and discernment were the means of introducing to the New York public a number of singers and comedians whose success was phenomenal, and who took advantage of their launching at the Casino to sail away from Mr. Arousau on private ventures of their own, which, strange to say, in almost every case made fortunes for those concerned in them. But the hard times overtook the Casino, and it has now passed into the hands of a firm who will give a sort of Vaudeville in it. Mr. Arousau has fairly broken down, and has been very ill, but is recovering, and is to receive a great benefit, at which many performers who owe much of what they are to him will assist. The details of this are not yet made public.

One of the most important movements towards bringing good orchestral music really within the reach of "the people" has been inaugurated by a number of prominent Society women of New York, and is to have its beginning at the Madison Square Garden, about the 15th inst. It is stated that these ladies have felt impelled to their present course by the rapid increase in the number of more or less objectionable summer entertainments, and the entire absence of cheap and harmless recreation for the multitudes who must remain in the city during the heated term. Accordingly, the Madison Square Garden has been leased for six weeks, and a large orchestra, under the direction of Mr. Frank Van der Stucken, will play on six nights of each week, the programmes covering a very wide range to suit all possible tastes. The real novelty of the enterprise will be the prices of admission, which will range from 15 to 50 cents, according to location—the last figure entitling one to one of the best seats in the building. In a part of the great auditorium smoking and the service of light refreshment will be allowed. This is the first genuine attempt at providing New York with "People's" concerts of really meritorious order at low prices, and it is greatly to be hoped that it will be sufficiently successful to warrant repetition.

A Musical Festival has recently been given at Albany with considerable success; and at Ann Arbor, Michigan, a series of Festival performances has just been given, of which Berlioz's "Faust" was the most important.

Concerning Church music there is, of course, little to be said. Engagements for the coming year are now all made, and choirs have settled down to work. Mr. Gerrit Smith, of the South Reformed Church, who is one of the hardest working and most conscientious Concert organisers in New York, recently gave his two hundredth Recital. These Concerts have covered a period of ten years, during which time some 650 compositions have been performed.

It is reported that an event is about to take place which will have a considerable influence upon New York Church music. This is the purchase of the Church of the Holy Trinity by the New York Central Railway for a million dollars. The congregation of Holy Trinity will join forces with that of St. James's Church, and a new and imposing building is to be erected for their occupancy. This amalgamation will produce, probably, the largest and wealthiest "up town" church in the city, and it is rumoured that the sum appropriated for music will be more liberal than any yet devoted to that purpose in New York, which is saying a good deal.

The music of the new church will be under the control of Mr. Alfred S. Batler, a talented young American, some time a pupil of Sir John Stainer, and, more recently, of Dr. Dvůřák.

Mr. William C. Carl, who is one of the more ambitious of concert organists in New York, and who is a former pupil of Mr. Samuel P. Warren, has recently produced a new and important Organ Sonata from the pen of M. Guilmant, under whom Mr. Carl studied for a time. The work is dedicated to Mr. Clarence Eddy, the well known Chicago organist, and in dimensions and construction is without doubt the most imposing composition for the organ which M. Guilmant has yet brought forth. In form it resembles one of Widor's Organ Symphonies rather than the sonata of the stereotyped pattern, as it has five movements: an Allegro, Adagio, Scherzo, Recitative, and a Choral and Fugue. Though exhibiting marked freshness and originality of treatment at all points, its principal interest to musicians probably lies in the Scherzo, which displays a boldness and fire which M. Guilmant has never surpassed. The technical demands of the composition are severe, but Mr. Carl was equal to them and succeeded in giving the new sonata an able and convincing interpretation.

MUSIC IN PARIS.

"TANNHAUSER" still continues its successful career at the Opéra. M. Van Dyck having been indisposed on several occasions, his place was filled by M. Saléza, who had thus the opportunity of making his début in the part of Tannhäuser, which he did with success. Madame Calvé has cancelled her engagement here for next winter, and will go to America instead.

The first performance of "Guernica," a lyrical drama in three acts, by MM. Gailhard and Ghensi, the music written by M. Paul Vidal, took place at the Opéra Comique on the 8th ult. Guernica is a village of the Basque country, and the book of the opera is founded on an episode of the Carlist war there in 1873. M. Vidal is an accomplished musician, and has done all that is necessary in order to give life to this event, the situations of which are not very original. He has borrowed largely from the music of the Basques, which is very rich in the variety of its themes. The music displays good workmanship, but the inventive powers of M. Vidal appear rather to have been employed in the arrangement of his picturesque material than in the creation of a purely musical work. A one-act piece, called "Pris au piège," by M. Michel Caré, the music composed by M. Gédalge, has also been produced. For this burlesque of Italian influence, M. Gédalge has written very excellent and thoughtful music, perhaps too important for so trivial a subject.

On May 25 the 100th performance of "Cavalleria Rusticana" was given. The work was severely censured by the critics on its first production!

On the 8th ult., at the Théâtre d'Application, an interesting performance of the "Songs of Miarka," by M. Alexandre Georges, was given; these were admirably sung by Madame Collier. "Myrrha," an Idyll in one act, by the same composer, the libretto by M. Armand Sylvestre, was also heard. This is a charming little work, which will become very popular in the drawing-room. M. Paul Viardot, the well-known violinist, together with M. Pierret the pianist, have founded a new Society, entitled "La Société des auditions de musique nouvelle." During the course of the interesting Concerts given by this Society, a string quartet by M. Guy Ropartz attracted some attention. It is an interesting work, the music being of a very florid description, but it is too long; a Pianoforte Quartet by Mr. Foote (the American composer), and a Sonata for pianoforte and violin by Leken were also favourably received. The Académie des Beaux Arts has awarded the "Chartier" prize (for chamber-music) to M. G. Alary.

M. Saint-Saëns has returned to Paris after a long voyage in the East; he has completed the score of "Bruneilde," a work left unfinished by Guiraud. The annual competitions of the Conservatoire took place, in private, on the 24th ult., and continue to the 9th inst.; and, in public, from the 18th to the 30th inst. Among the future Knights of the Légion d'Honneur, to be elected on the 14th inst., we notice the names of MM. Paul Vidal and Charles Lérébure. The libretto given to the competitors for the Prix de Rome to be set to music is entitled "Clarisse Harlowe," the librettist being M. Noel. M. Leon Keist, the musical critic of the Petit Journal, has been re-elected President of the Musical and Dramatic Critics' Club. There has been a question for some time past of giving dramatic and lyrical performances at the old Théâtre d'Orange, and the Minister of Public Instruction has at last appointed a commission for that purpose. Paris will shortly have a Rue Alboni, Rue Padeloup, and Rue Lalo. The artists whose names are thus perpetuated have, in their different spheres, well deserved the gratitude of the Parisians. "The cry is still they come" is a remark that may be applied to the never-ceasing publications on Wagner. "Tannhäuser, at the Opéra in 1861," by M. G. Servières, has just made its appearance. M. Constant Pierre is issuing a curious publication entitled "Musique exécutée aux fêtes nationales de la Révolution Française." Another book by the same writer, called "B. Sarette, ou les origines du Conservatoire de musique et de déclamation," will shortly appear.

It is not our rule to notice Concerts at private houses, but that given on the 21st ult., at 74, Eaton Square, by Miss Isabella Donkersley and Miss Annie Fry, calls for mention on account of its special excellence, and from the fact that the young ladies were pupils of the Royal College of Music, and two of the best performers on their respective instruments—violin and pianoforte—trained at that Institution. The programme included an interesting, fresh, and melodious Suite for violin and pianoforte (Op. 4) by Ed. Schütt, and Brahms's splendid Trio in C minor (Op. 101), in which latter the Concert-givers were joined by Mr. W. H. Squire, another old College pupil and a most able performer on the violoncello. Both works received sympathetic and carefully finished renderings. The violinist's solo was Kiel's "Solostück," a work of considerable distinction, which enabled Miss Donkersley to display her fine tone and expressive style to the best advantage; while Miss Fry was equally successful in Chopin's Scherzo in C sharp minor, which she played with all requisite spirit and feeling. Miss Katherine Timberman, an American mezzo-soprano, sang a number of songs in the orthodox three languages. Her voice is somewhat "reedy" and unsympathetic in quality, but she sings with intelligence and care, if with but little warmth. Mr. Squire stooped to conquer the difficulties of an effusion by the everlasting Herr Popper, a hotch-potch of hackneyed Hungarian tunes entitled a "Rhapsody." He succeeded completely.

THE Musical Artists' Society gave its final subscription Concert for this season at St. Martin's Town Hall, on the 17th ult. The chief features of the programme were Mozart's Quintet in E flat for pianoforte and wind instruments and a Suite in three movements for flute, oboe, clarinet, horn, and bassoon, by Mr. W. S. Hinchliff—the latter, a clever, fluently written work, lacking, however, repose and being somewhat monotonously scored. The effect of both quintets would have been enhanced had more light and shade marked performances otherwise fairly praiseworthy. Miss E. A. Chamberlayne, assisted by Miss E. A. Dauncey, brought forward three little pieces for pianoforte and violin from her own pen, entitled "Berceuse," "Legend," and "Cradle Song," notable for tenderness and simplicity. In striking contrast to these expressive trifles were three numbers for the pianoforte, written and played by Miss Marie Wurm, who set forth their vigorous character in most inspiring fashion. Miss M. Ford and Mr. B. Albert joined forces with excellent result in Walter Macfarren's bright, musicianly Sonata for pianoforte and violoncello in E minor, and the other instrumentalists were Miss A. Boden, Messrs. F. Hopkins, W. S. Hinchliff, T. Stabbins, W. Wallis, and S. H. Jones. Miss J. Hunter, Miss B. Sladdin, and Messrs. D. Lewis and Karlyle sang.

THREE Concerts of early, mediæval, and modern music respectively were given in the Queen's (Small) Hall by Madame Marie Mély, Miss Adeline de Lara, and Mr.

Sydney Brooks. The first programme (on May 30) in date ranged from 1250 to about 1740, and included finished performances by Miss de Lara, the pianist, of a couple of Scarlatti's Sonatas and Bach's Fantasia in C minor. Mr. Brooks played with considerable skill violoncello Sonatas by Marcello and Padre Martini. The songs given by Mdlle. Mély were drawn from the stores of Purcell, Handel, Arne, and others. At the second Concert (5th ult.) the scheme extended from 1740 to 1825, Gluck, Haydn, Mozart, Beethoven, Weber, and Schubert being represented. Miss Isabel Hirschfeld was the pianist, and proved thoroughly efficient. On the 13th ult. the list of composers was virtually brought down to our own time. Miss de Lara resumed her place at the pianoforte for the solo pieces, and by her neat rendering of a Study by Chopin, the "Waldesrauschen" of Liszt, and contrasted sketches by Paderevski and Stojowski, afforded the utmost satisfaction.

THE 300th anniversary of the death of St. Philip Neri, the founder of the Oratorians, was celebrated at the Brompton Oratory on May 26. The programme of the day was well selected and admirably executed by the choir. Beethoven's Mass in C was given with the accompaniment of a full band, and at the offertory Schulthes's "Amavit" was sung, in which Master Hogan took the solo. In the afternoon Mozart's Vesper service was performed with full band, Master Turnbull Sinclair singing the solos in the "Laudate Dominum" and the Magnificat. In Austin's "Tantum Ergo" the same boy was very effectively heard. The great feature of the evening service was the Te Deum composed by the late Mr. Thomas Wingham, which was sung with trumpet accompaniment, the rendering of the choruses being a fine specimen of spirited singing. At all the services Mr. Arthur Barclay Jones conducted and Mr. D'Evry presided at the organ.

FRENCH music formed the material of two Concerts at the Salle Erard (11th ult.) and Princes' Hall (12th ult.) respectively, at both of which appeared MM. Alfred and Jules Cottin, vocalists and mandolinists from Paris. In each branch they exhibited considerable taste and refinement, and on the second occasion were deservedly commended for a well-balanced rendering of their own duet, with accompaniment for two guitars, "Il est Minuit," and of Mario Costa's "Sérénade Andalouse." Some artists from the Parisian Concerts-Colonne took part, among them M. Mariotti, the violoncellist, whose excellent tone and execution were advantageously manifested in a "Meditation" from Massenet's "Thais." Mdlle. Louise Douste de Fortis was the solo pianist. The programme comprised striking specimens of the grace and delicacy of Jonicères, Augusta Holmès, Délibes, Guy d'Hardelot, Bemberg, Godard, and other modern composers.

At the Concert at Bridgewater House, on May 28, for the benefit of the St. Helena Home and House of Rest, an interesting feature of a miscellaneous programme was a brief description, by Professor Bridge, of the production of "Comus," with Henry Lawes's incidental music, at Ludlow Castle, before the Earl of Bridgewater, Lord President of the Marches, in September, 1634, the composer being at that time music-master in the Bridgewater family. Professor Bridge brought with him Mr. W. Fell and some of the Westminster Abbey choristers to sing five short and melodious solos—two for treble and three (including the air "Back, shepherds, back") for tenor voice—as examples of the style of the musician who sturdily maintained that the art was as advanced in his own country as in any other.

THE annual Festival of the London Gregorian Choral Association, which was celebrated in St. Paul's Cathedral on the 13th ult., was more than usually impressive. Upwards of 1,500 executants took part in the procession, this being the largest assemblage the Association has ever brought together. The Rev. Jesse Brett and the Rev. S. Childs-Clarke had respectively written two special processional hymns, both being set to music by Mr. Arthur H. Brown, who also had adapted the antiphons to the Psalms and Canticles. Dr. Warwick Jordan provided the music to the Canticles themselves, and presided at the organ. The anthem was "O Lord, our Governour," by Henry Gadsby.

THE South Hampstead Orchestra, ably conducted by Mrs. Julian Marshall, offered an ambitious programme for its tenth annual Concert, held at the Hampstead Conservatoire, on May 29. Among the works undertaken were Beethoven's "Eroica" Symphony, Bizet's first "L'Arlesienne" Suite, Brahms's "Variations on a Theme by Haydn," Dr. Hubert Parry's Overture to "The Frogs" of Aristophanes, and the Overture to "Euryanthe." The rendering of the Symphony was characterised by exceptional intelligence and conscientiousness. Mr. David Bispham sang, with his accustomed well-controlled energy, Lyriart's scena from "Euryanthe" and Stanford's "Cavalier Songs," in the latter of which he was supported by a male choir.

At the Military Concert at Queen's Hall, on the 12th ult., in aid of the Royal Cambridge Asylum for Soldiers' Widows, all that was needed was a larger attendance. The bands of the Grenadiers, Coldstreams, Scots Guards, Royal Engineers, and Royal Artillery played, under their respective conductors, a selection that embraced movements from symphonies and suites, overtures and marches. The Guards' bands in combination did justice to Massenet's "Scènes Pittoresques," but the special successes of the occasion were gained by the string band of the Royal Artillery (conducted by Cavaliere Zvertal) in the first portion of Schubert's "Unfinished" Symphony and in the majestic "In Memoriam" Overture of Sullivan—the latter a superb performance.

At Queen's Hall, on the 10th ult., Miss Carlotta Elliot gave a very delightful Concert, with the aid of Miss Marie Wurm and Herr von Dulong. Miss Elliot sang with perfect taste and appropriateness of style a selection of vocal pieces ranging from Scarlatti to Blumenthal, and including examples of the art of Schubert, Schumann, Brahms, Massenet, Beethoven, and others. Miss Wurm, besides playing the accompaniments to all the vocal pieces, contributed several solos, and also figured in the scheme as the composer of two charming duets for soprano and tenor, both of which had to be repeated. They had not previously been heard in public. Herr von Dulong's solos were Mozart's "Un aura amorosa" and Grieg's "Im Kahne."

THE performances by the Liedertafel and Damen-Gesangverein, of Mayence (already alluded to in these columns), of Handel's "Hercules" and "Deborah" are announced to take place at that town on the 21st and 22nd inst., under the protectorate of the Empress Frederick and of the Grand Duke and Duchess of Hesse. The performances are rendered special by the fact of the critically revised scores of these oratorios by Dr. Chrysander, the editor of the German Handel Society, being made use of, and thus brought to a practical test for the first time on this occasion.

IN connection with the Croydon Conservatoire of Music a Violin Recital was given in the Small Public Hall, Croydon, on the evening of the 4th ult., by Mr. Frederik Frederiksen, professor of the violin in the Conservatoire. The programme included Sonata in D minor (Gade), in which Mr. Frederiksen was joined by Miss Grace Henshaw; two movements from Mendelssohn's Violin Concerto, Introduction and Rondo (Saint-Saëns), and Elegie and Rondo, Op. 48 (Sauret). Miss Waite contributed songs by Chaminade and Sullivan and two charming compositions by Mr. Harvey Löhr, the latter being accompanied by the composer.

MR. FRANK HOWGRAVE, at Princes' Hall, on May 28, further manifested his ability as a pianist. He successfully joined in Mendelssohn's Quartet in B minor (Op. 3), and was associated with Mr. Louis H. Hillier (violin) in a meritorious performance of Beethoven's Sonata in G (Op. 30, No. 3). Mr. Howgrave's solo essays included Paderewski's Nocturne in B flat and Caprice in G, each played with correct feeling. Miss Martyn-Hart was deservedly applauded for her rendering of Godard's "Angels guard thee," and valuable service was given by Madame Elise Inverni and Mr. Sydney Brooks (violinello).

MR. HENRY R. A. ROBINSON gave a Concert at Blackheath Rink Concert Hall, on May 29. The artists were Miss Margaret Hcare, Miss Helena Dalton, the Meister

Glee Singers, Miss Ethel M. Rorke (violin), Mr. Charles Lesimple (violinello), and Mr. Henry R. A. Robinson (pianoforte). The Concert-giver was heard to advantage in Chopin's Scherzo in B flat minor and Bendel's "Bosquet de Julie" and "Cascade du Chaudron," being twice recalled after each performance. Grieg's Sonata in F for pianoforte and violin was also very favourably received.

A NEW cantata, by Mr. George Shinn, entitled a "Harvest Thanksgiving Cantata," was introduced to a Crystal Palace audience by the London Cantata Choir on the 19th ult. Several suitable Harvest hymns are introduced in different parts of the work, to be sung by congregation and choir. The solo parts were sustained by Miss Florence Armriding, Miss Annie Northcroft, Mr. Edwin Smith, and Mr. Robert Poole. Mr. Horace Holmes accompanied at the pianoforte and Mr. George Shinn at the organ, while Mr. William Binns made an efficient Conductor.

MRS. CLARINDA A. WEBSTER gave a Concert on the 13th ult., in the Queen's (Small) Hall, the programme of which was vocal, with the exception of a couple of violin compositions, by Wieniawski and Sarasate respectively, neatly played by Miss Fanny Wolff. Miss M. M. Fraser gave Grieg's "Solvejg's Song" in a refined manner, Miss Berry Jones distinguished herself by a bright rendering of Bemberg's "Love, the thief," and Miss Kate Florence James and Mr. Joseph Claus also sang. Recitations varying in spirit were effectively delivered by Miss Pauline Barrett.

PREPARATIONS are going forward for next year's performances at Bayreuth, when the twentieth anniversary of the foundation of the Festspiele is to be marked by the resumption of the "Nibelungen Tetralogy." Dr. Hans Richter, who conducted the original performances under Wagner's personal direction, is to be again the Conductor. So far as is yet known, Miss Macintyre will assume the part of Sieglinde, Mr. Ernest van Dyck will be the Siegfried, while for the part of Siegmund Frau Cosima Wagner is understood to be in treaty with M. Edouard de Reszké.

A CONCERT was given, on May 31, at the Queen's (Small) Hall, by Signor Vinci, a violinist of considerable ability. The programme included Rubinstein's Trio (Op. 52) and a Violin Sonata by Veracini. In both these Signor Vinci was assisted by Signora Vitelleschi, whose playing was of material service to the violinist, the lady having a special gift in the difficult art of accompanying. Signor Rotondo played the violoncello part in the trio. Miss Rosa Leo's songs were a distinct feature in the Concert, and Miss Maude Gardner played a solo on the harp.

MISS BEATRICE HALLET gave an interesting Historical Lecture-Recital at the Somerville Club, on the 4th ult., illustrating the development of musical form from the Suite or Partita to the Sonata and thence to modern programme music. The examples chosen were Suite, No. 5, in G major (Bach), Sonata, Eis (Haydn), Sonata Pathétique (Beethoven), Kinderscenen (Schumann), Hungarian Dance and Volkslied (Brahms), and some smaller pieces by Chopin, Schubert, and Mendelssohn. The whole were admirably played by Miss Hallet.

MASTER REDGRAVE CRIPPS gave a Pianoforte Recital at Steinway Hall, on the 11th ult. This young gentleman, who is a pupil of Mr. Carnell, gave every indication of high endowment. The programme included selections from a Suite of Bach, Beethoven's Sonata in D minor (Op. 31), selections from Mendelssohn, and a group of pieces by Chopin. In all these Master Cripps showed technical acquirements far in advance of his years, and undeniable signs of intelligence and feeling. Mr. Arthur Oswald assisted.

MDLLE. DE LIDO gave a Concert, at Steinway Hall, on the 13th ult. Her singing of Goring Thomas's "Le Baiser," the scena "Il est doux," from "Hérodiade," and a number of other songs and duets, was effective, although she was evidently suffering from hoarseness. Madame de Swiatlovsky, Mr. Hirwen Jones, and Mr. Herbert Thorndike also sang, and violin and pianoforte solos were played by Messrs. Johannes Wolff and Wilhelm Ganz.

A CONCERT consisting entirely of English music will be given at the Sing-Akademie, Berlin, in December next. The programme is to comprise Mackenzie's "Britannia" Overture, Sullivan's Overture to "Macbeth," Stanford's Pianoforte Concerto and "L'Allegro" Symphony, besides works by Parry, Bennett, Purcell, and others. The solo artists will be Mr. Leonard Borwick and Mr. Plunket Greene; and the Philharmonic Orchestra, conducted by Professor Stanford, will assist. Here is news indeed!

THE Marlborough Place Amateur Orchestral Society gave its first Concert on May 28, the Conductor being Herr Paul Oppenheimer. The programme included movements from two of Haydn's Symphonies, German's Dances from "Henry VIII.," and other pieces. The Society has only been formed about six months, and the progress made during that time reflects much credit on the Conductor. Miss Da Costa and Mr. C. Karlyle contributed songs, and Mrs. Matheison accompanied.

THE Misses Ada and Mabel Calkin gave their first Concert at the Steinway Hall, on the 11th ult. Miss Mabel Calkin's vocal solos and the pianoforte playing of Miss Ada Calkin were distinguished by refinement and skill, and both sisters achieved a distinct success. Mr. John L. Child's recitations, the singing of Mr. Arthur Oswald, and the violin playing of Mr. Gerald Walenn added to the attractions of the programme. Mr. Henry Bird was the accompanist.

MISS WINIFRED ROBINSON'S Chamber Concert, on the 1st ult., in the Queen's (Small) Hall, attracted a numerous audience which gave frequent manifestations of appreciation of the meritorious manner in which an excellent programme was executed. Miss Robinson received able assistance from the Misses Amy Hare, Maud Turner, Edith Werge, and Kate Ould, whose performance with the Concert-giver of Dvorák's Quintet in A (Op. 81) was the chief feature of the evening.

THE many advantages possessed by the Hope-Jones system of organ building are strikingly shown by its recent application to the organ in St. George's, Hanover Square. Not only has the tone of the instrument been distinctly enriched, but, it now being played from the chancel, the organist is able to secure a balance of tone and unanimity of attack with the choir before unattainable.

MR. OTTO PEINIGER gave a Violin Recital on the 15th ult., at Princes' Hall. Mr. Peiniger played Mendelssohn's Violin Concerto, and a number of young ladies, amongst whom may be mentioned Miss Katharine Kendall, gave effective evidence of the excellent results of Mr. Peiniger's teaching. Songs were given by Miss Louise Burns and Mr. Walter Ford.

MR. CLARENCE EDDY, the eminent American organist, appeared at the Queen's Hall Sunday Popular Concert of the 23rd ult., and, among other works, played, for the first time in London, a new Sonata by M. Guilman, details of which are given in our American letter. Mr. Eddy's performances at this and the three following Sunday Concerts will receive notice next month.

MR. JEAN GÉRARDY has recently purchased from Messrs. Hart and Son a fine violoncello by Antonio Stradivari. We understand the instrument is an excellent specimen and possesses an extraordinary tone, which musical amateurs will have an opportunity of hearing when this gifted young artist returns to London.

THE Newington Choral Society gave a Concert at the Parochial Hall, Kennington Park Road, on May 30, the principal feature in the programme being Gaul's cantata "Joan of Arc." The principal vocalists were Miss Ada Loaring, Mr. Miles Mole, and Mr. Frank Swinford. Dr. Jacob Bradford conducted.

MR. G. L. STUTFIELD, the Conductor of the Cremorne Orchestral Society, Chelsea (a Society established for the practice of symphonies and high-class music), has been presented by the members of the Society with a handsome testimonial in the form of a massive marble clock, suitably inscribed.

AT All Saints', South Lambeth, on the 20th ult., Mendelssohn's "Hymn of Praise" was sung, accompanied by organ and orchestra. The soloists were Miss Florence Monk and Mr. Fred Elliott. Mr. Henry Dart presided at the organ, and Mr. Walter Attersoll, Organist of the Church, conducted.

MR. NEWMAN has arranged to give a series of Promenade Concerts in the Queen's Hall in the autumn, beginning on August 10. Mr. Henry J. Wood will be Conductor of the orchestra, Mr. Carodus will act as leader, and it is stated that the French pitch will be adopted.

BRAHMS'S two new Sonatas for clarinet and pianoforte (Op. 120) were played, for the first time, on the 24th ult., at Miss Fanny Davies's Concert at St. James's Hall. The performance took place too late for notice in our present issue.

THE directors of the Royal Carl Rosa Opera Company have re-engaged Mr. Barton McGuckin. Miss Ella Russell and probably Mr. Ludwig will also be in the company. Mr. Vianesi will be one of the conductors next season.

HERR SEIDL'S name will be included in the list of Wagnerian Concert conductors next season.

OBITUARY.

WE have to record the death, on the 12th ult., of ALFRED BROUGHTON, the gifted and highly esteemed Conductor of the Leeds Philharmonic (choral) Society. He was the younger brother of the late Mr. James Broughton, who rendered such eminent service in the training of the great Yorkshire choir upon the revival, in 1874, of the Leeds Musical Festival, and with whom he was then associated in the capacity of pianist to the Festival chorus. In 1883, his brother's health failing, Alfred Broughton assumed the latter's duties in the periodical re-organisation and training of the choir, an arduous task of which he acquitted himself with conspicuous zeal and ability. The Leeds Philharmonic Society has, on two occasions, given performances in London under his conductorship. Mr. Alfred Broughton, who, like his brother James, died of consumption, was only forty-three years of age, and leaves a widow, a contralto singer much valued in Yorkshire circles.

WE record, with regret, the death of Mrs. SIMS REEVES, the wife of the distinguished English tenor, which occurred at Upper Norwood on the 10th ult. As Miss Emma Lucombe the deceased lady attained considerable popularity as a soprano singer, she having been a pupil of Mrs. Blane Hunt, and as long ago as June 19, 1839, appeared at a concert of the Sacred Harmonic Society. Upon her return, in 1848, from a three years' study of opera in Italy, Miss Lucombe came to be much in request, both on the lyrical stage and in concert rooms in this country, and in the succeeding year she made her début, in association with Mr. Sims Reeves, at one of the Philharmonic Concerts. Their marriage dates from the year following this event. Although long since retired from public life, Mrs. Sims Reeves has been, until quite recently, most actively and successfully engaged in the tuition of her art. She was in her seventy-fifth year.

RICHARD GENÉE, the popular composer of operettas and able librettist, died at Pressbaum, near Vienna, on the 15th ult. Born on February 7, 1823, at Danzig, where his father was manager of the Municipal Theatre, Genée was associated with theatrical life almost from infancy, and his facile musical gifts enabled him, at a comparatively early age, to occupy the post of conductor at different German theatres. He was director of the Landes-Theater, in Prague, from 1863 to 1868, in which latter year he accepted the important orchestral conductorship at the Theater an der Wien, in Vienna. From this position he retired ten years later, and has since been exclusively occupied with the composition of light opera of the specifically Viennese type, and, in association with his friend Zell, the furnishing of librettos of the same order to Johann Strauss, Suppé, Millöcker, and others, the fertility of the joint authors in this direction being truly remarkable. Among Genée's most popular operettas may be instanced, "Die Generalprobe," "Rosita," and "Der Seccadet," the latter produced in this country under the title of "The Naval Cadet." The close proximity of the death of Gené to that of his colleagues, Zell and Suppé, adds a peculiar emphasis to the event.

In Senhor GERVASIO LOBATO, professor of elocution at the Lisbon Conservatorio, whose death towards the end of May last is announced in the Lisbon papers, Portugal has lost one of her ablest and most versatile dramatic authors and librettists. When only fifteen years of age he started a journal, A Voz Academica, to which he contributed some original stories, and in 1873 brought out his first dramatic work, the comedy "Debaixo da Mascara," at the Gymnasio. A number of other stage works followed in rapid succession, many of which have been translated into Spanish and Italian. Amongst his operettas, written in conjunction with the composer Cyriaco Cardozo, may be instanced "O Burro do Senhor Alcaide," "O Solar dos Barrigas," "Coco Reineta," and "Facado e Testamento," the two former especially meeting with extraordinary success. Lobato, who was also an able adapter of French librettos and a novelist of note, wielding one of the most fertile and, it is said, best remunerated pens in Portugal, was only forty-five years of age.

JEAN JOSEPH BOTT, best remembered probably in his capacity of violin virtuoso of considerable attainments, died recently at New York, in his seventieth year. Bott was born on March 9, 1826, at Cassel, and was a pupil of Spohr. After a period of touring in various parts of Europe, in the course of which his fame as a violin player was everywhere established, he settled down as a Capellmeister, first at Cassel, in 1852, then at Weimar in 1857, and finally at Hanover, from 1865 to 1878. For the last ten years he has resided in New York, occupied in teaching. The deceased artist was the composer of two operas, "Der Unbekannte" and "Aktæa," as well as of a symphony, several violin concertos, and other compositions for that instrument.

SAMUEL CUTTER, a well-known musical amateur, died at Liverpool, on the 11th ult., at the age of forty-seven. Deceased had for many years occupied the position of musical critic on the local Daily Post and was much esteemed by a large circle of both professional and non-professional friends and acquaintances.

We have also to record the following deaths:—

On April 24, at Monte Video, ALESSANDRO UGUCCIONI (native of Barcelona, of Italian parentage), excellent first violinist of the Teatro Solís and of the Cathedral, professor at the Lira Academy, aged fifty.

On May 19, at Namur, JEAN PHILIPPE JACQUET, violoncellist of note, director of the Municipal Academy of Music, aged seventy-eight.

On May 20, at Königstein, near Frankfort-on-Main, SIGISMUND KOHN-SPEYER, formerly director of the Frankfort Stadt-Theater, husband of the late Antonie Labitzky, the distinguished vocalist, aged sixty-five.

On May 23, at Dresden, EMIL SCHUBERT, celebrated low comedian at the Hof-Theater, formerly popular lyrical tenor at the Kroll and Friedrich-Wilhelmstadt Theatres, Berlin, in his fifty-sixth year.

On May 24, at Barcelona, JUAN OBRADORS, gifted pianist, pupil of Gottschalk.

In May last, at Marseilles, CHARLES EDOUARD MICHEL, the distinguished musical critic of the Sémaphore, and contributor to the Guide Musical, formerly secretary to the Marseilles Conservatoire.

On May 27, at Varese, PIETRO BERNASCONI, one of the foremost organ-builders of Italy—amongst others, of the magnificent organ in the Church of San Lorenzo, Milan.

Recently, at Vienna, COUNTESS WENZEL KAUNITZ, formerly, as Joséphine Czernak, a highly popular operetta singer.

On the 3rd ult., at Reichenberg, Fräulein MARIE TEIMER VON GANAHL, gifted pianist, aged twenty-four.

Recently, at Pesaro, ANNIBALE MENGOLI, excellent contra-basso, professor at the Liceo Rossini, aged forty-four.

On the 10th ult., at Bordeaux, MADAME EUGÉNIE SOURGET, highly esteemed pianist and vocalist (pupil of Zimmermann and Bertini), composer of an opera, "L'Image," of chamber music, and numerous songs, aged sixty-eight.

On the 17th ult., JAMES PECK, aged eighty-six, who for a number of years served the late Sacred Harmonic Society as assistant-secretary, and was also known in the early days of that Society as a trumpet player.

Last month, at Boston, U.S., MARTIN ROEDER, excellent violinist (pupil of Dr. Joachim), formerly teacher at the Royal Irish Academy of Music, Dublin; since 1892 professor at the New England Conservatory, composer of several operas, aged forty-four.

On the 12th ult., at Wildungen, FRAU JULIE KOCH-BOSENBERGER, distinguished operatic vocalist, lately of the Royal Theatre, Hanover.

Last month, at Bologna, ULISSA DONZELLI, daughter of the once famous tenor, successful pianist and teacher, aged thirty-eight.

On the 20th ult., at Frittenden House, Kent, Lady OAKELEY, wife of Sir Charles Oakeley, Bart., elder brother of Sir Herbert Oakeley. Lady Oakeley was a talented musician, and strove to advance the cause of her favourite art by all means in her power.

CORRESPONDENCE.

FROM KEYBOARD TO STRING.

TO THE EDITOR OF "THE MUSICAL TIMES."

SIR,—Some months ago I received a letter from a well-known professor of music at Cambridge, in which he writes: "It has long been a matter of wonder to me how the great differences of tone which are produced by different players on the pianoforte can be accounted for mechanically, and I hope your researches may have thrown light on this point. I remember once rashly pronouncing a Broadwood Concert-grand which I had heard played on by only one performer to be a detestable wiry instrument, and, after hearing Frau Schumann play on it, having to box the compass and confess that it had a beautiful, round tone!"

In discussing the action of the human mechanism used in producing sounds on the pianoforte, I have had this same question raised so frequently, and my attempt at explanation has so often been thought satisfactory, that it strikes me it might perhaps be of interest to make it more generally known—not that I wish to claim originality of idea in the matter, for I believe the explanation cannot be new, only that if it has been in print before very few knew of it.

Among those who have devoted time and attention to the subject, no one has, perhaps, gone more heartily into the matter than the late Mr. Orlando Steed, who, in 1881, read before the Musical Association a paper on "Beauty of Touch and Tone," containing much that is very well thought out and interesting; but the conclusions he arrives at are hardly convincing. After affirming that we have the authority of Helmholtz for saying that every source of difference save one lies entirely within the domain of the pianoforte manufacturer and just as completely without that of the performer, and giving an interesting account of Helmholtz's theory, he draws the conclusion that the difference between a player with a good touch, as it is called, and one with an indifferent touch, does not depend upon the manner in which the key is struck, but upon the performer's control, as he says, over "the subtleties of rhythm—of rhythm in its twofold aspect of duration and intensity." Mr. Steed was evidently not sufficiently informed on mechanical points to discover a mechanical explanation, so that by assuming, wrongly, such explanation to be impossible, he argues, wrongly also, that the fault must therefore be with the rhythm.

In my opinion we must certainly admit, with Helmholtz, that the rapidity with which the hammer strikes and quits the strings (we must bear in mind that the performer has no separate command whatever over this rapidity of quitting) alone influences the tone—but, I would add, as long as the hammer is made to hit the string fairly on the square. This is just what it does not do when a loud dead tone is produced; it rakes the string, ever so slightly, perhaps, but still badly enough to interfere with the development of those harmonics whose presence or absence are requisite if the tone is to be full and round. Instead of thinking, with Steed, that the explanation sought has nothing to do with either the pianoforte mechanism of wood, leather, felt and steel, or the human mechanism of muscle, tendon, and bone, I am persuaded that it is dependent upon both; the variable factors being (1) in the instrument, the inertia (proportionate to the weight) of the hammer and the flexibility of the hammer shank; and (2) in the arm, the natural elasticity of the flexor muscle and tendon used to strike the key. Firstly, then, as to the hammer. If it had no weight, and, therefore, no inertia, and if the shank were perfectly rigid, the best way to produce a fine tone would certainly be to depress the key from beginning to end with very great rapidity; but as the hammer's unavoidable inertia must exert a certain initial resistance before it gets "under way," one can quite understand that for good loud tone an ideally sensitive finger, by depressing the key during, say, one-fourth of its course more slowly than the remaining three-fourths, might impart a greater velocity combined with a more steady movement to the hammer-head at the instant it strikes the string than a finger moving at a great but uniform rate would be able to do. (It confirms my opinion to observe that if a note be struck very softly one can detect no difference between the tone elicited by a blow of the knuckle sideways, for instance, and that produced by the most careful pressure of the finger, and that it is almost entirely in the louder passages that the great disparity between pianists' power of tone-production is noticed.)

I only mention the sensitiveness of a finger capable of acting with a variable velocity during the descent of a key in order to assist in explaining my meaning, for I can hardly believe that any fingers are capable of such a nice distinction; and indeed the necessity for imagining such an ideal movement disappears if we take into consideration differences in the natural elasticity of the muscles and seek explanation from this standpoint. So we come to the second variable factor, in the pianist's arm, and as mechanical questions are often best explained by illustration, I will follow that method. Take an ordinary door, of a fair weight, and try various means of shutting it with great rapidity. Give it a violent slap with the hand; it hardly moves, because the time during which the force acted was too small to allow of the inertia being overcome. Take a piece of board, like a cricket bat, and give a violent blow with that; the movement of the door is still out of proportion to the violence employed. But cover the board with an elastic cushion, an inch or so thick, and then a blow of less intensity will produce a more rapid and steady movement of the door, the inertia of which is overcome during the compression of the elastic cushion—in other words, the cushion provides means of converting the great force, acting during say the $\frac{1}{10}$ th of a second into a smaller one acting during $\frac{1}{4}$ th of a second or so. Time is an all-important factor, because this same door which will not yield to an instantaneous slap may yet be easily moved by the pressure of a little finger acting during a measurable interval.

So it is in tone-production. If our muscles are strong but unyielding—i.e., if their contraction produces a dead blow like that of the bare board, all attempts to produce loud good tone will end in "banging" caused by the raking movement of the hammer; but if they are of the best quality and possess a certain natural elasticity (independent, this is, of their strength or contractile power), that elasticity will act upon the key and upon the hammer in the same way as the cushion upon the door, and a player so gifted will be as incapable of producing a "banging" tone in playing as another may be of producing a beautiful one. Each hammer movement, in the hands of the best players, is a "clean" one, the hammer-head being started on its way without violence and hitting the string with a quick impact entirely free from shakiness or "raking" movement.

The fleshy pad at the tips of the fingers is also of use in this respect and will partially assist, when well developed, in producing good tone.

W. MACDONALD SMITH.

THE "CON SORDINO" IN BEETHOVEN.

TO THE EDITOR OF "THE MUSICAL TIMES."

SIR,—I have read your interesting article on the fascimile of Beethoven's Sonata in A flat (Op. 26), but on comparing your quotations with the printed copy fail to see in what manner that from the first bar of the Trio of the Funeral March differs with regard to the employment of the pedal from what is generally printed. Sensa sordino means, of course, "without dampers"—i.e., with loud pedal—and con sordino, the reverse. This is what is printed in my edition and others that I have seen. Is it not an error in the article?—Faithfully yours,

FRED. G. SHINN.

[We cannot accept our correspondent's statement with regard to the meaning of sensa sordino and con sordino, and therefore see a marked difference between the autograph and most of the editions now in circulation, including the critical one published by Messrs. Breitkopf and Härtel. Had Beethoven written sensa and con "sordini," Mr. Shinn would be right in his contention. But in an article next month we shall discuss at length the special meaning of the word sordino as used in this and other of Beethoven's Sonatas; also the errors into which editors and even learned doctors have fallen through not distinguishing between the words sordino and sordini. These two terms are not merely singular and plural forms of the same word, as some appear to think.—Ed., M.T.]

THE CANTICLES OF THE CHURCH.

TO THE EDITOR OF "THE MUSICAL TIMES."

SIR,—The question of your correspondent, "An Enquirer," under the above heading in this month's MUSICAL TIMES is easily answered.

In the first English Prayer Book (published in 1549) the "Jubilate Deo," "Cantate Domino," and "Deus Misereatur" found no place except in their rightful position among the daily Psalms. They were only inserted in Matins and Evensong in the Second Prayer Book of 1552, in deference to the opinion of those extreme reformers who, influenced unduly by foreigners, preferred the use of Jewish Psalms to Christian Hymns, and had a special antipathy to the Magnificat as being the "Song of the blessed Virgin Mary."

Some of the greatest of the old Church composers—e.g., Tallis, Gibbons, and Purcell—set the Benedictus to music; but it is to be feared that the chief reason why (until within recent years) the Jubilate was the popular Cantic at Matins, lies in the fact that it contains about half-a-dozen verses less than the Gospel Cantic! This opinion is strengthened by comparing the number of settings of the Cantate and Deus with those of the Jubilate. Those are comparatively few, while within the first half of the present century (and indeed almost ever since the Restoration) nearly every Morning Service contained a Jubilate.

The theological prejudice against the Gospel Canticles has long since died out, and it is earnestly to be hoped that composers of Cathedral music will assist the clergy in their endeavours to restore the Benedictus especially to its place of honour in the Office of Morning Prayer, by only writing music for that as a second Cantic.

I am, Sir, Yours faithfully,

WALTER SLATER, B.D.,

Chaplain of Christ Church Cathedral, Oxford.

June 6, 1895.

TO THE EDITOR OF "THE MUSICAL TIMES."

SIR,—In reply to "An Enquirer," may I be allowed to point out that the Canticles "Jubilate," "Cantate Domino," and "Deus Misereatur" belong to the Psalter, and, as Psalms of the Old Covenant, are sung once a month by the Church in regular course.

It is therefore fitting that the hymns of the New Covenant—Benedictus, Magnificat, and Nunc dimittis—should not be excluded by a return to the Psalter after the reading of the Lessons. The Psalms of the Jewish Church pointed to the coming of Christ; the three Gospel Canticles are a thanksgiving for the Incarnation as an accomplished fact. Such being the case, we impoverish our Matins and Evensong by omitting the Canticles of the Gospel.

I quite agree with "An Enquirer" that it would be a great pity to lose some very effective settings of the Cantate and Deus. But we solve the difficulty at Worcester by using these Psalms as Anthems.

With a view to promoting this use, I should like to add that the issue of an octavo edition of such settings of the Cantate and Deus as those by Dr. Hopkins in A and Attwood in D would be a great boon to choirs.

Yours faithfully,

H. H. WOODWARD,
Precentor of Worcester Cathedral.

June 7, 1895.

[We have received several other letters to a similar effect on this subject which we regret we are unable to print owing to pressure on our space.—Ed., M.T.]

WESLEY'S "BLESSED BE THE GOD."

TO THE EDITOR OF "THE MUSICAL TIMES."

SIR,—It is, perhaps, not surprising that Dr. Wesley should not have reckoned this Anthem among his greatest compositions, as it "was written for an occasion when only trebles and a single bass voice were available." Yet it is marked by some characteristic touches of his genius.

Why, may I ask, will organists so continually ignore the composer's obvious intentions by striking the rest at the beginning of the concluding chorus? In the separate vocal parts, this rest has the word "silent" printed over it. After the fine chord at the close of the previous movement, an electrical effect is produced by the voices starting the chorus, after that one bar's silence, without organ. It may be answered that this is difficult to accomplish with precision; but such is not the case with properly trained choirs, and it would be a relief if other choirs would not attempt the Anthem at all.—Yours truly,

A. L. LEWINGTON.

Ardingley College, Sussex.

TO CORRESPONDENTS.

* * Notices of concerts, of which programmes must invariably be sent, and other information supplied by our friends in the country, must be forwarded as early as possible after the occurrence; otherwise they cannot be inserted.

Our correspondents must oblige by writing all names as clearly as possible, as we cannot be responsible for any mistakes that may occur.

Correspondents are informed that their names and addresses must accompany all communications.

We cannot undertake to return offered contributions; the authors, therefore, would do well to retain copies.

Notice is sent to all subscribers whose payment (in advance) is exhausted. The paper will be discontinued where the Subscription is not renewed. We again remind those who are disappointed in obtaining back numbers that, although the music is always kept in stock, only a sufficient quantity of the rest of the paper is printed to supply the current sale.

BRIEF SUMMARY OF COUNTRY NEWS.

We do not hold ourselves responsible for any opinions expressed in this summary, as all the notices are either collated from the local papers or supplied to us by correspondents.

BANGOR (N. WALES).—At St. Mary's Church, on Trinity Sunday, the 9th ult., Mr. A. R. Gaul's cantata "Israel in the Wilderness" was sung by the church choir, numbering fifty voices. The soloists were Miss M. E. Williams; Masters C. H. Goodwin and A. Willcox; Messrs. W. Pryce Smith, Walter M. Williams, and William Roberts. Mr. T. Westlake Morgan, the Cathedral Organist, presided at the organ, and Mr. William Price assisted at the pianoforte. The performance was conducted by Mr. Owen Price, the Organist and Choirmaster of the Church.

BEDFORD.—A good performance was given, on the 21st ult., in the Corn Exchange, of Henry Smart's cantata "The Bride of Dunkerron," by the Musical Society. The principal soloists were Madame E. Morgan, Mr. C. Ellison, and Mr. W. H. Burgon. Mr. E. Halfpenny led an efficient orchestra and Mr. P. H. Diemer conducted.

BRIGHTON.—A performance of Gade's cantata "The Crusaders" was the main feature of a Concert given on the 14th ult., at the Brighton School of Music. The cantata was given with orchestral accompaniment, the wind parts being played upon a harmonium. The "Crusaders' Song" and the spirited Finale were given with a fullness and vigour that were very creditable. The Conductor, Mr. Robert Taylor (whose pupils also sang the solo parts), secured a careful and well executed performance. In the first part of the Concert Mr. H. W. Gates, a pupil of Mr. W. Kuhe, gave a clever rendering of Chopin's Polonaise in A flat, Master W. G. Macdonald delighted the audience with Leclair's "Saraband and Tambourine," whilst other interesting excerpts, including Lortzing's Overture "Der Waffenschmied," by Dr. King's pianoforte class and the orchestra, made up a pleasant musical evening, in which about one hundred of the students of the school took part with much credit to themselves and their professors.

CHEL TENHAM.—A successful performance of Schumann's "Paradise and the Peri" was given, under the conductorship of Mr. C. J. Phillips, at the Ladies' College, on May 30. The band (led by Mr. Lewis Hann) and chorus worked well together, and the beauties of this charming work received an excellent interpretation. The part of the Peri was admirably sung by Miss Alice Crawley, the minor parts being adequately filled by well-known local singers.

ELV.—The Triennial Diocesan Festival of Parish Choirs was held in the Cathedral, on May 29, at 3 p.m. Thirty-five parish choirs, with the choirs of the Cathedral and Trinity College, Cambridge, took part, making a chorus of nearly 1,000 voices. A full orchestra of ninety performers, mainly drawn from the diocese, accompanied. The Rev. L. Borissow, Precentor of Trinity College, conducted, and Mr. T. T. Noble presided at the organ. In Psalm xxiv., one of those selected, an instrumental interlude was played at the points where the word "Selah" occurs. The employment of the notated edition of the "Cathedral Paragraph Psalter" secured excellent results. Stainer's orchestral setting in A of the Magnificat and Nunc dimittis was used, and the following selections were sung after the third Collect: Anthems, "O Lord, my God," Wesley (unaccompanied); "The Wilderness," Goss (with orchestra); "Come unto Him," Gounod (unaccompanied); the last two movements of the Symphony and the first chorus from the "Lobgesang" (Mendelssohn). The rendering of the music and the arrangements within the Cathedral—the latter under the superintendence of the Rev. J. H. Crosby, assisted by a large number of stewards—left little to be desired.

TRURO.—The seventh annual Festival of the Truro Diocesan Choral Union was held, on the 18th ult., in the Cathedral, and was largely attended. The special hymns and Psalms were impressively sung, and Sir John Stainer's anthem, "O clap your hands," excellently rendered. Thirty-nine Parish choirs were represented, the total number of voices being 725. Dr. M. J. Monk conducted, and received able assistance in the North and South transepts from the Rev. C. R. Sowell and Mr. Griffen. Mr. H. Thomas presided at the organ.

UDINGTON, N.B.—The two-manual organ, built by Messrs. Blackett and Howden, of Newcastle, in St. Andrew's Episcopal Chapel, was opened on Whit-Sunday by Mr. W. H. Hood, late Organist of St. Mary's, Hamilton. On Tuesday in Whit-week Mr. J. M. Preston, of St. George's, Jesmond, gave a Recital on the new instrument. His programme included Mendelssohn's First Organ Sonata, and compositions by Liszt, Guilmant, W. S. Bennett, Henry Smart, and Batiste.

WHITCHURCH, SALOP.—The 12th ult. being the anniversary of the dedication of the organ in the Parish Church, Gaul's "Holy City" was effectively rendered by about eighty members of the Musical Society and Orchestral Society, conducted by Mr. W. E. Rogers. The principals were Miss M. Holford, Miss C. Holford, the Rev. E. J. Evans, and Mr. Albert E. Ellis. Mr. Vernon Blount presided at the organ, and Mr. Harold Jarvis was engaged as harpist. The choruses were attacked with excellent precision, and the performance attracted a very large congregation.

ORGAN APPOINTMENTS.—Mr. J. E. Leah, to Providence Congregational Church, Rochdale.—Mr. F. G. Russell, Organist and Choirmaster to St. Edmund the King and Martyr, Lombard Street.—Dr. W. E. Thomas, Organist and Choirmaster to St. Clement's, Boscombe, Bourne-mouth.—Mr. Arthur Poyser, Organist and Choirmaster to St. Mary's Episcopal Church, Dunblane, Perthshire.—Mr. Allan Paterson, Organist and Choirmaster to Govan Parish Church, Glasgow.—Mr. Archibald R. Bown, Organist and Choirmaster to the Church of St. Saviour's, Walthamstow.

CHOIR APPOINTMENTS.—Mr. Frederick King (Solo Bass), to St. Philip's, Earl's Court.—Mr. W. A. Pittman (Alto), to St. Katherine's Collegiate Church, Regent's Park.—Mr. T. Westlake-Morgan, Choirmaster to St. Mary's Church, Conway.—Mr. Herbert Dyer (Tenor), to St. Mary Magdalene, Paddington.

FIRST STEPS

AT THE

PIANOFORTE

BY

FRANCESCO BERGER.

(No. 45. Novello, Ewer and Co.'s Music Primers and Educational Series. Edited by Sir JOHN STAINER and Dr. C. HUBERT H. PARRY.)

Price Two Shillings and Sixpence.
In Paper Boards, Three Shillings.

PREFACE.

This "Elementary Primer for the Pianoforte" aims at supplying "beginners" with a "Method" to be used from end to end in the order in which it is compiled.

Although "Pianoforte Instructors" are as numerous as the sands of the sea, I claim for this one that it is quite original not only in its progressive order, but also in the language employed.

Convinced that it is worse than useless to crowd a child's mind with words which, to that child, convey no meaning, I have studiously used only such words as a child with moderate intelligence can be expected to understand.

The student must, before attempting to play, acquire a correct and unerring mental picture of the arrangement of the keyboard.

Counting aloud should become a habit from the very first finger-exercises.

The customary "Household melodies" have been carefully avoided, because I confidently believe that, while engaged on a familiar melody, the student is unconsciously playing more or less "by ear," even correcting his own errors that way—instead of "reading" (deciphering) every note of the Piece.

Diatonic Scales are not included. Till the student is sufficiently advanced to be taught the construction of major and minor scales, he is better without "scales" at all; and it does not come within the scope of an "Elementary Primer" to teach all that "the Scales" imply.

Some Scale-passages, however, with no necessary tonality, are included.

The so-called "English" fingering has been discarded in favour of the more universal "foreign" fingering.

FRANCESCO BERGER.

HAMILTON CLARKE.

SUMMARY OF ARGUMENT.—The annual ceremony on the First of May, of the Installation of the Queen of the Daisy Chain, has been instituted by the Schoolmaster of the village, for the purpose of rewarding the most popular of the scholars in the girls' school. The celebration affords opportunity for an interesting display, and the author has woven into it a very ingenious and amusing plot, in which some of the most interesting characters are the Schoolmaster and Schoolmistress, a Ladies' Volunteer Ambulance Corps, commanded by Surgeon-Captain Amanda Chuckles, four other female and five male principal characters, with a chorus of schoolboys and girls. The scene is laid in the playground of the school.

EXAMINATIONS in PIANOFORTE PLAYING, SINGING, THEORY, and all branches of Music will be held in London and at 350 Provincial Centres in December next, when Certificates will be granted to all successful candidates.

SYLLABUS and FORMS of ENTRY can be obtained of the Secretary, who will supply all particulars. The last day of entry is November 15.

SILVER and BRONZE MEDALS and BOOK PRIZES are offered for competition in accordance with the regulations.

APPLICATION for the formation of NEW CENTRES should be made to the Secretary, who will furnish all necessary information.

The DIPLOMAS granted by the College are Associate (A.L.C.M.), Associate in Music (A.Mus.L.C.M.), Licentiate (L.L.C.M.), and Licentiate in Music (L.Mus.L.C.M.). Regulations and list of Diplômes on application.

In the EDUCATIONAL DEPARTMENT Students are received and thoroughly trained under eminent Professors at moderate fees. Classes are held in various subjects.

THE NEW BUILDING,

Containing spacious Reception Rooms, Class and Examination Rooms, Concert and Lecture Hall, &c., has been fitted throughout in modern style, and will be formally opened for the reception of Students early in September.

T. WEEKES HOLMES, Secretary.

A NOVELTY.

A Complete Oratorio, Opera Recital,
 Opera in Costume,
 AND Ballad Concert Party, INCLUDING SIX SOLO INSTRUMENTALISTS,
 THE WHOLE COMPRISING ELEVEN ARTISTS.

MADAME FANNY MOODY,

Prima Donna, Royal Italian Opera, Covent Garden.

MISS OSBORNE RAYNER,

Principal Contralto of the Choral Societies at Albert Hall, Queen's Hall, &c., in London and Provinces.

MR. WILLIAM DEVER,

Principal Baritone of all Choral and Ballad Concerts in London and Provinces.

MR. JOHN CHILD,

For five years Principal Tenor, Carl Rosa Grand Opera Company.

MR. CHARLES MANNERS,

Primo Basso, Royal Italian Opera, Covent Garden.

SOLO INSTRUMENTALISTS—

MISS GORDON NUNN,

Solo Violin at the Principal Orchestral Concerts in London and the Provinces.

MR. NOEL JOHNSON,

Solo Violoncello at the Crystal Palace, Queen's Hall, St. James's Hall, &c., Concerts.

MR. ALFRED BLOME,

Solo Violin at most of the Principal Concerts in London.

MR. JOHN ANSELL,

Solo Viola, Covent Garden, Crystal Palace, &c.

MR. E. O. ADAMS, Solo Double Bass, from the Promenade Concerts, &c.

CONDUCTOR AND PIANIST: MR. LEONARD HANRAY.

Mr. Hanray has conducted at Drury Lane and Principal London Oratorio Societies.

Suggested Programme for a FULL Ballad Concert.

Parts I. and II. could consist of VOCAL AND STRING QUARTETS, TRIOS, OR INSTRUMENTAL SOLOS, &c., AND BALLAD SCENAS, &c., accompanied with one or more STRINGS, OBBLIGATOS, &c., SONGS, &c., the whole lasting from two to three hours.

Suggested Programme for Ballad and Opera (IN COSTUME) Concert

(which we found so great a novelty and success last season).

Part I. could consist of BALLADS, SCENAS, DUETS, STRING QUARTETS, TRIOS, VIOLIN SOLOS, &c., same as above, only lasting for about an hour and a quarter.

Part II. OPERA OR OPERETTA (in costume) ACCOMPANIED BY THE SIX INSTRUMENTAL ARTISTS, WHICH WOULD FORM AN ORCHESTRA.

Suggested Programme for Choral Society.

Part I. A small Oratorio Work with Chorus.

Part II. An Operetta in Costume, or the above party can be engaged for a whole work (Oratorio or Opera), or Opera in Costume or Recital.

IMPORTANT NOTICE.—By special arrangement the above Solo Instrumentalists would play in a work given by a Choral Society, or a Society can engage one or all the Instrumentalists, as well as one or all the Singers, for an Oratorio, or Recital of an Opera, thereby saving the travelling expenses of Instrumentalists coming from a distance.

RÉPERTOIRE.

"Faust" (Gounod), "Philemon and Baucis" (Gounod) (by arrangement with Sir Augustus Harris).

"Maritana" (Wallace), "Bohemian Girl" (Balfe), &c., and most of the usual Oratorios, &c.

The Garden Scene from "Faust" or "Philemon and Baucis" or "Maritana" or "Bohemian Girl" (without Chorus, but in Costume), is good for Second Part of a Ballad Concert.

N.B.—The Opera "Petrucio," by Mr. Alick Maclean, having been awarded the £100 prize by the Judges, was first performed by us, on June 29 last, at the Royal Italian Opera, Covent Garden, with the greatest success. It is now added to our Répertoire.

Everything, such as Costumes, &c., will be provided by the party, except Piano. No Scenery is required.

ANY OF THE ABOVE ARTISTS CAN BE ENGAGED SEPARATELY, AND MADAME FANNY MOODY OR MR. CHARLES MANNERS CAN ACCEPT THEIR USUAL ENGAGEMENTS.

For Terms, &c., please write to permanent address—

MR. CHARLES MANNERS,

15, KING STREET, PORTMAN SQUARE, LONDON, W.

THE EVOLUTION OF POLYPHONY.

I.

OF late years the term "polyphonic" has been largely used to designate effects that used to be spoken of as "contrapuntal." In Grove's Dictionary "Polyphony" is defined (by the late Mr. Rockstro) as "a term applied, by modern musical historians, to a certain species of unaccompanied vocal music in which each voice is made to sing a melody of its own; the various parts being bound together in obedience to the laws of counterpoint into an harmonious whole, wherein it is impossible to decide which voice has the most important task allotted to it, since all are equally necessary to the general effect. It is in this well balanced equality of the several parts that Polyphonia differs from Monodia, in which the melody is given to one part only, while supplementary voices and instruments are simply used to fill up the harmony."

Except that the term these words so well describe is now used for instrumental as well as "unaccompanied vocal" music, Mr. Rockstro's definition may be accepted as quite "up-to-date," and therefore, according to latter-day standards, of quite ideal excellence.

We purpose now to sketch the progress of music properly designated as "polyphonic" from its beginnings to the end of the fourteenth century. The exact epoch of those "beginnings" it is, of course, not easy to fix. The changes now known scientifically as "evolution" take place very gradually, and in their first manifestations are often so slight that contemporary observers fail to notice them at all. Polyphony emerged, quite naturally, from the earliest form of Homophony called Organum. In the Organum the accompanying parts moved in similar motion with the melody in fourths below or fifths above, or both; and if we may believe Fétis, this kind of "harmony"—atrocious though it be to modern ears—came into vogue with the Romans at about the time when they conquered Greece, and prevailed throughout the Empire during the first thousand years of the Christian Era. Towards the end of this epoch, however—that is to say, in the tenth century—we hear of practices that show a distinct advance towards that independence of parts which constitutes polyphony properly so called. Instead of a continual sequence of fourths or fifths, such passages as the following make their appearance—

These specimens are taken from the treatises attributed to Hucbald and Guido, which contain the earliest examples of the kind that have hitherto come to light. Hucbald died in 930 and Guido more than a hundred years later, but as recent researches tend to show that the work attributed to Hucbald was not written until the eleventh century, it will be safe to speak of these examples as indicating the practices recognised among the learned just before, and after, the year 1,000. As, however, such practices must have preceded their description, we may be sure that the "first beginnings" of polyphonic music were heard—though not written down—hundreds of years earlier. "The most rudimentary kind of Polyphony," says Dr. Hugo Riemann, "and certainly the first that arose, was the holding of a low note, above which a melody was played." Historical evidence of the early appearance of this kind of polyphony he finds, naturally enough, in the hurdy-gurdy, bagpipe, and other instruments of the Middle Ages having a bourdon or "drone" bass. It is easy to trace, in the above musical examples, the influence of the effect in question.

During the half-century immediately following the death of Guido, musicians realised the importance of making the voices proceed by contrary motion. An anonymous treatise of the eleventh century (fourth quarter)—found in the Ambrosian Library at Milan, in 1847, by Messrs. Danjou and Morelot—contains a piece in two parts which exhibits the improvement very clearly. It consists of one of the well-known "Kyrie" melodies still used by the Roman Church, with a counterpoint above, mostly in contrary motion, but containing also several consecutive fourths and fifths. We quote the first two phrases—using modern notation for the purpose, in order to show the phrasing of the ancient melody and better to exhibit the thematic structure of the upper voice-part. It will be noticed that the composer of this "discant" has aimed at unity of effect by deriving his melodic figures to a great extent from those of the fundamental theme—the canto fermo. Thus his second and third notes are imitations (in the fifth above) of the fourth and fifth notes of the under melody; his sixth, seventh, eighth, and ninth notes (here marked a) are an imitation of the group in the lower part which immediately follows, and so on. This little example is worthy of careful study. In spite of harmonic crudities, the added part shows already considerable melodic independence; played or sung alone—with expression and not too strictly "in time"—its grace is undeniable, whilst its thematic affinity with the under melody and the "imitative" effects attempted (and not without success) prove that modern scorn of these early workers in a then absolutely new field is entirely unjustified. They were the real "inventors" of the wonderful modern art of polyphony, perfect command over which was not attained till the middle of the sixteenth century. The little example we have just considered—this little example alone—exemplifies two of the most important artifices employed in polyphonic writing—viz., contrary motion and thematic imitation.

We will now consider part of another composition of about the same epoch—i.e., late eleventh (or perhaps early twelfth) century. The original MS. from which it is taken is in the Paris library, and its translation into modern notation is due to Coussemaker:—

Compared with the Kyrie, this piece shows of course a great advance in freedom, symmetry, and resource. In the course of the composition—which contains thirty-nine bars in all—the voices combine to sing sixths four times, and thirds no less than sixteen times; the tonality is so clearly defined that the eighth bar suggests a modulation into the relative major, and the sixteenth one to the dominant of that; and "passing notes" appear in three places. Coussemaker and Fétis both quote this MS. as of the date we have already given; but Ambros, without giving a reason, refers to it as of the fourteenth century! As in the former case, we recommend that the two melodies should be sung, or played, separately, before being joined. The principal melody is of course allotted to the under-voice.

We now come to a piece that has only been brought to the notice of musicians within the last few years,* but is of such importance to the history of music in England that it deserves far more attention than has yet been given to it. In a MS. in the Bodleian Library at Oxford there is a Hymn to St. Augustine, the last two lines of which are set to music for two voices. To indicate the notes the alphabetic notation of fifteen letters is used, the letters being arranged in two parallel lines, thus:—

h g f g . h k l n . &c. h h h g . h g g f .

dots being employed in twelve places to show the divisions between the phrases. The MS. in question (Bodley, 572) is made up of four separate MSS., all believed by experts (among them the librarian of the Bodleian) to have been originally written in Cornwall, most probably in a Benedictine monastery, during the tenth century, but containing, on some of the pages, additions made by Anglo-Saxon hands in the eleventh century. The hymn we are considering is one of these, and the most eminent judges of the age of handwriting consider it to have been inscribed during the last quarter of the century in question—speaking roughly, perhaps twenty years or so after the Norman conquest; that is to say, over 800 years ago. Here is a translation of it. (See next page.)

Musicians are accustomed to adduce "Sumer is icumen in," which dates from about the third decade of the thirteenth century, as a proof of the early proficiency of English musicians in the art of polyphonic writing; but here is a composition which antedates that celebrated piece by about a hundred and fifty years, and which tells the same tale, but in a far more striking way. For if both pieces are measured by the standards of their own time, it will be seen that the art shown in the eleventh century composition is far more extraordinary than that exhibited in the famous "Round." But even if this were not so, the existence of the earlier piece would at least serve to show how utterly untrustworthy are the contentions of those who speak of "Sumer is icumen in" as though it were a kind of miracle, exhibiting effects never known before and in no way to be accounted for by the operation of evolutionary forces. It is clear that a nation capable of producing the eleventh century piece would have little difficulty in reaching, in the space of a century and a half, the stage exemplified by "Sumer is icumen in." This fact becomes still more obvious when the social and artistic influences which made themselves felt during that particular epoch are

* See the Rev. Dr. Mee's paper read to the Musical Association, May, 1885.

The version we here present of this piece is, as regards the barring and the value and accentuation of the notes, our own, as, in these respects, of course the alphabetic notation gives no clue, and the MS. contains over twice as many notes as syllables. The actual sounds and the phrases, which we have indicated by commas, are, of course, given exactly as they occur in the MS. Those of our readers to whom our version does not commend itself can easily make others of their own by re-arranging the time values of the notes. We may, however, say that before deciding on the version here given, we had made no less than twenty-two others; and whatever system of time arrangement be adopted, it will be found that the thematic unity of the piece cannot be got rid of. Even if the notes be played quite evenly throughout (stopping, of course, at the places indicated by the commas), the little subject—will remain prominent all through, either in its complete form, or mutilated, or in inversions of its complete or mutilated forms. We are ourselves of opinion that the melody is that of a popular song to which—just as in the case of “Sumer is icumen in”—Latin words have been adapted. If our version be accepted as the “natural” one, it will be seen that the form of the piece is quite symmetrical. There are two “periods” of eighteen bars each and a Coda of four; and each “period” contains two groups of four bars, two of two, and one of six. These, in the first period, are divided as ten and eight; in the second, as eight and ten. The exceedingly “modern” tonality of the melody will not escape attention:—

Ut tu - o . . . pro - pi - ti - a - - - tus, in - ter ven - tu . . . do - mi - - nus, . . .

nos . . . pur - ga - - tos . . . a . . pec - ca - - - tis,

jun - gat cœ - - - - li ci - vi - bus, ci - - vi - - bus.

taken into consideration. This was the era of the Crusades; of the troubadours and minstrels; the period during which organs in our churches, hitherto scarce, became quite common, and the stave and mensural notation gradually came into use; and during which arose the first “school” of composers properly so called—that of Paris.

The musical remains of the twelfth century do not, unfortunately, include a single example of English skill. The foreign compositions show, as regards those for two voices, very little advance, and are in no case comparable to our last illustration. They, however, include examples of music for three voices, and show therefore that at about this time attempts were being made to produce effects of greater richness and complexity. Among the very earliest preserved are some by Perotin, organist of Nôtre Dame. His three parts, however, are seldom real—the third voice generally doubles one of the others, or remains silent, in one case for over fifty bars out of eighty—so that practically the pieces are examples of two-part writing. The following bars, which occur in an "Alleluiah," are the only ones out of over eighty in which three different sounds are heard together:—

Three ways were adopted for the composition of polyphonic music—whether in two, three, or more parts—by the mediæval writers. One (the simplest) was to take two, three, or four already existing melodies—secular or sacred—and force them to go together by such alterations in the time of their notes as were found necessary. These alterations notwithstanding, the resulting harmonic combinations were often such as would revolt the modern ear, and were not always to be justified even by the rules recognised among mediæval musicians. A second method was to take an existing melody and accompany it throughout with another, composed for the purpose, and which, while it was often based on figures derived from the first, was made as independent of it as the talent of the composer would allow; and the third way was to select a theme, generally from the music of the Church, and by imitations, direct or inverted, of either the whole theme or parts of it, to construct three or four voice parts that would combine according to the harmonic laws then regarded as governing pleasurable effects. This method, it need hardly be said, is precisely the same as that employed by Palestrina or Bach in the composition of a fugue.

We subjoin specimens of the results achieved by the practice of each method, all three composed during the twelfth century, and all given in Coussemaker's "Histoire de l'Harmonie au Moyen-Age":—

These extracts bring our subject to the close of the twelfth century. Its further progress during the thirteenth and fourteenth centuries must be reserved for a second article.

FROM MY STUDY.

JOHN BRAHAM (Abraham), whose portrait is now added to THE MUSICAL TIMES gallery, belonged to the Eastern race which has given to Western music so many brilliant professors. He was born in London in, or, according to some authorities, about 1774, and, while yet a child, lost both his parents—an event which, it is said, compelled him to pick up a living in the streets by selling pencils. How he became acquainted, in this position, with the singing master, Leoni, does not appear; we know only that the Italian (who was, probably, an Italian Jew) discovered young Abraham, took him under his protection, and taught him singing. The child's aptitude must have been great, for, in 1787, Leoni put him on the Covent Garden stage, where he sang, for his master's "benefit," "The soldier tired" and "Ma chère amie." "Yesterday evening," wrote a journalist of the period, "we were surprised by a Master Abraham, a young pupil of Mr. Leoni. He promises fair to attain perfection, possessing every necessary requisite to form a capital singer." It is even said that, at this early age, he was able to execute with correctness most of the bravuras that had been sung by Madame Mara. After his capital start, all went well with "Master Abraham" till his treble voice left him. A season of trouble followed, while, to make matters worse, Leoni fled the country, owing to what a biographer gently styles "the at Bath, in 1794. The Conductor of the Bath Concerts at that time was Rauzzini, a generous as well as discerning man, who took the young Jew as a free inmate of his home for three years, gave him lessons gratuitously, and procured for him remunerative engagements. Braham was in this happy position when (1796) Storace offered him a début at Drury Lane. The venture proved a success (poor Storace did not live to see it), and, a year later, Braham was engaged for Italian opera at Covent Garden. Still the rising tenor refused to be content, and nothing disarrangement of his domestic concerns." Braham, however, was not long without a protector. Another Jew, Abraham Goldsmith (Goldschmidt) took him in hand, and sheltered the lad till increasing attainments justified him in setting up as a professor of the pianoforte. But, with a true instinct, Braham was not satisfied in that position. He had sung as a boy; he would sing as a man, and he took every opportunity, with the characteristic perseverance of his race, to develop his voice and improve its use. This led him to make acquaintance with Ashe, the flautist, under whose auspices he made his first appearance as a tenor would satisfy him save residence and study in Italy. There also he was successful, but solicitations from London prevailing, he returned in 1801, to enter upon a most brilliant and extended career. Re-appearing in a poor opera, "The Chains of the Heart," which soon failed, Braham conceived the plan of writing the music of his own part in future works, and for some years insisted upon this curious procedure. It is almost enough to state, as regards his success, that, in 1809, the manager of the Theatre Royal, Dublin, paid him two thousand guineas for fifteen performances, and then made a fresh contract for thirty-six nights on the same terms.

Braham's good fortune lasted till 1837, when, as man "never is, but always to be blest," the great tenor joined with the actor, Yates, in buying the Colosseum, Regent's Park, for £40,000. That proved a disastrous speculation, as did the building of St. James's Theatre at a cost of £26,000. His fortune vanished in these foolish ventures, and, not long before his death in 1856, the poor old man, a shadow of his former self, appeared in Exeter Hall, nominally as a singer, really as an object of charity.

"In energy and pathos of style," writes one various theatres, on the strength of a reputation which seemed immortal, and his proficiency in singing Handel was universally acknowledged when his career as a popular vocalist had reached its termination.

Braham was composer as well as singer, and, as already stated, wrote much of the music he afterwards sang in opera. But his chief distinction as a creative musician lies in the fact that he composed "The Death of Nelson," and performed the rare and difficult feat of giving his country a national song.

MADAME CARADORI-ALLAN.

biographer, "Braham was unrivalled, and his powers in this respect were especially conspicuous in accompanied recitative, which generally expresses strong passion: thus, "Deeper and deeper still," of Handel, was the chef d'œuvre of Braham's declamatory and pathetic manner." "His compass," says another writer, "extended to about nineteen notes, and his falsetto, from D to A, was so entirely within his control that it was hardly possible to distinguish where his natural voice began and ended. After his voice had lost its natural power he was successively engaged at

The prima donna known as Madame Caradori-Allan was born at Milan in 1800, her father, Baron de Munck, being an ex-officer of the French army. It is said that all the musical instruction Maria Caterina Rosalbina de Munck ever received was given by her mother, simply by way of "accomplishment" and with no thought of professional life. But, with the death of the Baron, the resources of his family failed, and the musical training of the daughter at once came to the rescue. Taking the name of Caradori, which was in her mother's family, the young girl came to London, then, as now, the place in which, if anywhere, money could be made. Her début took place in January, 1822, when she played Cherubino at three days' notice, that being her first appearance on any stage. The novice seems to have thrown some new life into the character, and, singing well, made an uncommon success. The position of the young artist was at once secure, and she sang in London year by year till 1827, her salary rising meanwhile from £300 to £1,200. She was even more triumphant in the concert-room, being engaged throughout the country at festivals and other special occasions. This was the case above all in 1834, when she returned to England after a somewhat long absence, and took a conspicuous part in the Handel celebration at Westminster Abbey. From 1835 she remained in England as one of the heads of her profession, and, in 1846, took the soprano part at the first performance of "Elijah," not, however, entirely to the fastidious Mendelssohn's satisfaction.

Madame Caradori, who, in 1823, married Mr. Allan, secretary of the King's Theatre, died on October 15, 1865. "Her voice," says Mr. Julian Marshall, in Grove's Dictionary, "though not very powerful was exceedingly sweet and flexible, and her style almost faultless. She had much knowledge of music, and sang with great delicacy and expression. In a room she was perfect. Her appearance was interesting, her countenance very agreeable, and her manner modest and unassuming; she always pleased, though she never astonished, her audience." A writer, contemporary with herself, observes:

"The principal advantages possessed by Madame Caradori are a voice of great sweetness, flexibility, and justness of intonation; and extensive knowledge of the different branches of her art, and a facility of reading music by which she is enabled at once to sing and accompany, a prima vista, any vocal piece which is presented to her. To these may be added an intimate knowledge of four languages, an agreeable person, a graceful deportment, and high moral character."

It is possible to find both instruction and amusement in perusing volumes of old concert programmes—instruction, because they throw a flood of light upon the taste and procedure of the time to which they belong; amusement, because they stimulate the imagination to call up many a picture of quaint simplicity and of the readiness to be pleased with simple things which is to be found now only at ballad concerts, and such like.

I have before me a collection of programmes issued by the Devon and Exeter Harmonic Society between the years 1815 and 1824; these being preceded by what is, apparently, a catalogue of the Society's vocal pieces, over ninety in number. The glee was then in its glory down West, and a large proportion of the works favoured at Exeter belong to that class. Hence, as I turn the leaves, I am continually meeting with the names of Lord Mornington, Shield, Steevens, Webbe, Callcott, and other worthies of a fine old English school. People could then sing and hear the bombastic rant of Ossian Macpherson, as set to music by the composers of the day, and it seems to have been much favoured by the Devonians, although the only "windy heights" they knew were those of Dartmoor. Here I find Steevens's "Some of my heroes are low," Callcott's "Chief of the windy Morven," "Who comes, so dark, from ocean's roar," "In the lonely vale of streams," and so on. But this sympathy with the distant North did not result in neglect of flowers blooming at home. Exeter was undoubtedly proud of its Jackson, and sang from time to time, with fine impartiality, his vocal overture, "Wake at our call, melodious airs," "Go, feeble tyrant," "Love in thine eyes for ever plays," "Time has not thinn'd my flowing hair," "In a vale closed with woodlands," "Take, oh! take those lips away," and many more. This was all very right and proper, as well as natural, and from home sympathy with Jackson may have arisen, in some measure, the preference for English composers to which the catalogue bears witness on every page. But this preference was not exclusive. The Harmonic Society drew upon Handel for "Disdainful of danger," "The flocks shall leave the mountains," "The many rend the skies," &c.; and upon Mozart for the trio, "La mia Dorabella," and for the adapted music of a glee, "The signal I hear that awakens my fear." In the catalogue may also be found certain pale and shadowy foreign ghosts lingering between the time-stained pages, but altogether invisible in the haunts of men. Who knows now of Pucitta and his "Viva Enrico," yet he was an entity in his day, director of opera in London, and composer of the music to twenty-three lyric dramas. Moreover, he died as recently as 1861, having been born in 1778. His opera, "Le Caccia d'Enrico IV.," was produced in 1809, so that the Devonians had an extract from it pretty early, as music travelled in those days. Again, who knows of Saffery? Not even the editor of Grove's Dictionary, by whom he is not mentioned, either in the body of the work or in the supplement. But they knew him at Exeter eighty years ago. Such is fame!

Turning to the programmes, I find that the Devon and Exeter Harmonic Society gave an annual series of eight concerts, beginning in October and ending in March. To account for this flourishing enterprise in a remote and comparatively small city at such a date, it must be remembered that Exeter, like Chester, York, and Norwich, was then, for its district, what London is now for the entire country—a social capital, to which the "classes" of that day repaired in the winter season, their intention of pleasure being not unmixed, perhaps, with considerations of business in matchmaking. Music there alternated with the ball and the card-party, and it may be that the city had its Master of Ceremonies, distantly emulous of the glory of Beau Nash, sometime King of Bath. The M.C., however, is immaterial. We are sure of the concerts, and reasonably certain of the balls and the card-parties.

It is clear that the Exeter public loved to take their music mixed. The first programme opens with an Overture by Rosetti (who was Rosetti?), then come vocal pieces by Jackson, Webbe, Callcott, and Paesiello, the first part ending with "Fixed in His everlasting seat." An overture by our old friend, Vanhall, opens the second part, which includes vocal selections from Smith, Greville, and Jackson, and closes with "Let the bright Seraphim," leading to "Let their celestial concerts." Strangely enough, the "bill" does not mention the name of a single executant, and even refuses that of the conductor. In the character and order of the programme just sketched we see the model afterwards followed. There are, as a rule, two overtures or other instrumental works, among which I find, in the list of 1816, Storace's "Lodoiska," Corelli's Eighth Concerto, a horn Concerto (anonymous), an unnamed Overture by Martini, another by Bishop, and Steibelt's "Storm" Concerto. In 1817 were played the Overture to "Samson," the Overture to "Don Giovanni," a Violin Concerto by Giarnovich, in connection with which appears the executant's name, Mr. Ashwick; a Flute Concerto by Hugo, Overtures by Kreutzer, Pleyel, &c.

These works were often repeated, from which it may be gathered that the public were not impatiently curious. Only in 1818 do I find additions to the repertory, such as a symphony by Pichtl, an overture by Jomelli, and, for the first time, a symphony by Beethoven, as to the identity of which the programme is silent. An overture by Beethoven and one by Mozart figure together in 1819; the first being repeated later in the year. Of the symphony I find nothing more, it being, perhaps, a little too strong for the public; but the master's Overture, "Men of Prometheus," becomes a distinct favourite, as do the Overtures to "Le Nozze di Figaro" and "Die Zauberflöte." Here, assuredly, were marks of progress. The Society began to draw upon Rossini's overtures in 1823, leading off with that to "Tancredi," when, also, the name of a soloist appeared in the programme—by way of exception—and we learn that Henry Field played a Fantasia of Hérold and one, "The Fall of Paris," by Moscheles. Next comes the name of Cherubini ("Anacreon"), and the vocal compositions of Bishop show, by their number and frequent repetition, how popular they had grown. The volume ends with the programme of a Concert given, in 1823, by Signora Rovedino. Presumably, this lady was a daughter of Carlo Rovedino, the operatic bass, who died in 1822. A daughter of this artist married Weichsel, brother of Mrs. Billington. Miss Rovedino engaged for her Concert, Miss Witham (who did not appear), her brother, T. Rovedino, Mr. Rolle, and, for the glees, &c., Messrs. Spark, Cole, and Risdon. Mr. Spark, by the way, is surely none other than the father of Dr. Spark, of Leeds, he being then, as probably were the other gentlemen, a member of the Exeter Cathedral Choir. The programme was of much the same character as those already noticed, and calls for no particular remark.

The glimpses we have just had of musical doings in a provincial town eighty years ago are worth a whole chapter of general statements as an indication of public taste, and it is pleasant to state that we gather from them little save what is creditable. We cannot censure the Devonians for liking the admirable glees of native composers, while, as regards instrumental music, it is easy to mark a steady advance to the border, and beyond, of the region illumined by the works of great masters.

X.

BEETHOVEN AND THE SORDINO.

LOUIS ADAM, Professor at the Paris Conservatoire at the beginning of this century, says in his "Méthode complète de Piano": "Jusqu'à présent on n'a pas encore fixé les signes pour l'emploi des pédales." In this "Méthode" there is a chapter on the use of the pedals, in which mention is made of the loud pedal, and of the soft, shifting pedal; also of one in small pianofortes, "qui étouffe les sons encore plus qu'il ne le sont naturellement." This pedal, says the author, was commonly called "Jeu de luth" or "Jeu de harpe."

Hans Schmitt, in his famous work, "Das Pedal des Clavieres," speaks of the "Old Pianissimo" or "Flauto" pedal, by means of which a more delicate (feineres) pp could be obtained than with the shifting soft pedal ("Verschiebung").

And further, Mr. A. J. Hipkins, in his article "Sordini," in Sir G. Grove's Dictionary of Music and Musicians, states that the pianissimo pedal, patented by John Broadwood in 1783, was indicated by the Italian word sordino. And he gives an example from Thalberg's Op. 41.*

Now in Beethoven's Sonatas, Op. 26, 27, Nos. 1 and 2, and Op. 28, we meet with the expressions senza sordino and con sordino. Do they mean with loud pedal and without loud pedal, as is generally believed, or do they refer to the pianissimo pedal (the sordino mentioned above)?

In most editions of Beethoven's Sonatas we find the "loud pedal" marked where Beethoven had written senza sordino, and the removal of that pedal by means of the sign ★, where the composer had written con sordino. But is it not possible that the other explanation may hold good in some, if not all, of the very few cases in which those terms are employed?

The numerous editions of Beethoven's Sonatas scarcely help us; from them we are unable to find out exactly what the composer wrote. And without the very words of the master, it is, to say the least, difficult to discuss the matter with adequate precision. At a certain period Beethoven gave up writing the word sordino, and began to use the term Ped., also una corda; from Breitkopf and Härtel, and other modern editions, however, it is impossible to know exactly when that change took place. And yet one would like to compare his use of the term Ped. with his use of the earlier term senza sordino, so as to judge whether they might be regarded as synonymous. It is stated, in Steingraber's edition of Beethoven's Sonatas, that the master first employed the term Ped. in his Op. 53.

Then again, Herr E. Mandyczewski, in the preface to his English edition of Beethoven's Sonatas, published by Jos. Eberle and Co., tells us that he has sought after "the pure, unadulterated text of Beethoven's works; after the truth, and nothing but the truth." Now, in the Coda of the Variations of Op. 26 he marks senza sordini, and underneath, Ped. But, from the autograph, we know that Beethoven did not write the latter term (there is no Ped. in the whole of the autograph), and, further, that he wrote senza sordino and not senza sordini; the plural form in Mandyczewski may, however, be a misprint, as in all other places sordino is written. Then in the Trio of the Funeral March, where Beethoven wrote senza or con sordino, we find merely Ped. for the first, and * where the second is indicated. So that, without a knowledge of the autograph, we should naturally come to the conclusion that Beethoven had not written any words, but that he had occasionally marked Ped. and the sign * for its release.

* Sordino also occurs in Thalberg's "Grande Fantaisie sur la Sérénade et le Menuet de Don Juan," Op. 42 (Schott Edition, p. 16, bar 1). The passage is p., and has Ped. and ★ in the first and following bars; but under the arpeggio chord in the first bar is written Sordino.

Let us now turn to another edition—viz., the old one of L. Holle, published at Wolfenbüttel. The editor seems most carefully to have marked Beethoven's senza sordino and con sordino in Op. 26.* But in the Presto of Op. 27, No. 2, even accepting his Ped. as a substitute for Beethoven's senza sordino, he is not always in accordance with the autograph. In bar 99, counting from the double bars, Beethoven wrote con sordino, and, two bars later, senza sordino; yet the Wolfenbüttel editor in neither place marks Ped.! Here is the beginning of the bar in question—

Now let us turn to Op. 28. In the first movement, just before the recapitulation section, we find the passage—marked in the Holle edition, also in Addison and Hodson's edition (issued under Benedict's supervision), senza sordino in bar 1, and con sordino under the notes after the pause bar. But Holle, in other passages of that same movement, has Ped. He marks it, indeed, at the beginning of the long pedal passage of which the first four bars of the above quotation form the close. Did Beethoven actually write senza sordino and Ped. in the same movement? If so, surely the one is not an equivalent for the other. But our point for the moment is the confusion of the editions. Mandyczewski merely marks Ped. at first bar of above quotation, and the sign for its release at the pause.

At the end of the Variations we find senza sordini; but this, as in Mandyczewski's edition, may be a misprint.

Once more, the Breitkopf and Härtel edition says that the first movement (Adagio) of the Sonata in C sharp minor is to be played senza sordini. The first thirteen bars, and consequently the important heading, of the opening movement are, unfortunately, missing from the autograph; but from the repeated use of the term sordino in the Presto, it seems all but certain that Beethoven wrote senza sordino at the commencement. (Holle and Mandyczewski, by the way, write it thus.)

These examples will, it is hoped, show how difficult, nay hopeless, it is to discuss the sordino question with only the printed editions by way of guides. But, thanks to Dr. Erich Prieger, we have a fac-simile of the whole of Op. 26, and through his kindness we are able to refer also to the autograph of Op. 27, No. 2. And even if, with these helps, the sordino problem remain unsolved, this discussion may possibly lead to a more faithful reproduction, so far as is possible, of the text of Beethoven's Sonatas.

What proof, it may be asked, is there, that by senza sordino, as marked by Beethoven in the Sonatas, Op. 26, Op. 27, Nos. 1 and 2, and Op. 28, the composer meant loud pedal; and by con sordino, the reverse? The autographs of all the master's Sonatas up to Op. 26 are, unfortunately, missing, so that we cannot see what was his practice up to the first of those just named. In the Breitkopf and Härtel edition of the first two Pianoforte Concertos in C (Op. 15) and B flat (Op. 19) we find Ped. marked, also the star sign for its release; yet surely at the time when these were written Beethoven had not adopted the term Ped. In the Second Concerto (Op. 19, full score, p. 35) we find Ped. marked under a p passage, with pp strings, and the sign for its release eleven bars later. Meanwhile, however, the harmony has changed from tonic to dominant. There is here surely some error, or the composer wrote senza sordino, meaning literally, without the pianissimo pedal.

Now, on the other hand, is there anything in the pianoforte music of Beethoven's time in favour of reading his sordino as soft or pianissimo pedal? So far as we are aware, there are no pedal indications in Haydn's pianoforte works, or in those of Dussek. Something, however, may be learned from Schubert. In his song "Sei mir gegrüßt" (Op. 20, No. 1) the opening symphony is marked "pp mit erhobener Dämpfung" (with raised dampers), which, of course, means with loud pedal.

The opening symphony of his "Suleika" (Op. 14, No. 1) is marked "mit Verschiebung," a clear indication of the soft, or shifting pedal; and the same term is to be found in the Trio of the Scherzo of the Sonata in A minor (Op. 42).

In the song "Morgenlied" (Op. 4), however, Schubert writes in the opening bars "durchaus mit dem Pianissimo" (throughout with the pianissimo). This indication of the soft but not shifting pedal is of great interest; and it is the only one, within our knowledge, in pianoforte music.

But there is something of even greater interest and, for the matter under discussion, greater importance in the Andante of Schubert's Sonata in A minor (Op. 143). It opens thus:—

and every time a bar similar to the last one in above quotation occurs, the word sordini is written over it. Surely this must refer to the soft, sordino pedal. Beethoven, it is true, always wrote the word in the singular; but in Beethoven and Schubert's time there was, as Adam informs us, in the sentence quoted from his "Méthode," nothing settled as to the signs for the use of the pedals.

But once more, is there any internal evidence in the Sonatas, Op. 26 and 27, Nos. 1 and 2, and Op. 28, which would lead us to explain senza sordino as meaning without the pianissimo pedal, and con sordino as the reverse? We think there is.

First of all, the rare employment of either term deserves note. In the first and last movements of Op. 26, senza sordino is marked just in the closing bars. If loud pedal were meant it is curious that the term is used only in these places; there are other passages, especially in the first movement, where it seems necessary. And it should be noticed that in every case, one excepted, senza sordino is marked to a soft passage. Yet, if that term mean loud pedal, it is strange that it is never marked against a forte passage; in many bars (in the Funeral March, for instance) that pedal seems indispensable. The one exception is in the Finale of the C sharp minor; it occurs in the ff bars 36-35 (counting from the end); and, curiously, it is preceded by a similar passage, marked con sordino. And then, in certain places, the explanation of the term senza sordino as meaning without soft pedal, and con sordino as the reverse, seems specially suitable. Would not the ff chords in the Trio of the Funeral March of Op. 26—with soft pedal down (con sordino), give just the effect of muffled drums?

And is it irrational to suppose that the con sordino under the two quavers—in the second and similar bars of the Finale of Op. 27, No. 2, was also a special effect intended by the composer? Beethoven evidently liked the effect of loud chords with soft pedal. Here is one instance: the crescendo just before the inversion section of the Fugue in Op. 110. The whole passage is marked una corda. Bülow, in his edition of that Sonata, has a footnote reminding the player that he must bring the tone up to ff, yet keep down the soft (shifting) pedal.

But the name of Bülow reminds us of his edition of the C sharp minor Sonata (Op. 27, No. 2). He marks the first movement to be played con sordini, discarding Beethoven's direction SENZA sordini (probably taking the Breitkopf and Härtel edition as guide, he thought the composer had written the word thus). What led him thus to reverse what he regarded as the master's order? Why, he seems instinctively to have felt that the loud pedal was, at any rate, quite out of place in many passages. So that if we are right in our contention that the master meant, do not use the pianissimo pedal (senza sordino), Bülow, in marking some bars una corda, was, at any rate, nearer to the master's meaning than if he had followed the usual meaning attributed to senza sordini.

Dr. Louis Köhler, in his "Der Clavier-Pedalzug," gives senza sordino as meaning loud pedal, and tells us that, as the original title of Op. 27, No. 2, described the work as "per il Clavicembalo o Pianoforte," Beethoven used terms senza sordino and con sordino, which would apply to the clavicembalo without pedal, or to the pianoforte with pedal. But Op. 28 is marked merely for pianoforte, and yet the terms senza sordino and con sordino occur in the first movement; and, if Mandyczewski may be accepted as a guide, also Ped. This argues in favour of an interpretation of sordino as the special pianissimo or sordino pedal.

TRIBUTES, OLD AND NEW.

APART from the regular remuneration bestowed on public performers by their employers, the presentation of "tributes" from their admirers has always been one of the recognised privileges of the stage and, to a minor extent, of the concert-room. The institution is as old as the hills. Originally, no doubt, these tributes were drawn exclusively from the vegetable world. Wreaths and chaplets were at first the only prizes at the great games of ancient Greece—obvious imitations, as a patriotic Cambrian has declared, of the Welsh Eisteddfodau. A famous Greek orator has left it on record that his rival, who began life as an actor, had enough vegetables thrown at him to set up a greengrocer's shop. And if the Greeks threw carrots and turnips to signify their disapprobation, it is at least open to us to surmise that they presented choice flowers in evidence of their enthusiasm. And in despite of protests, more or less sincere, the "floral tribute" system has lasted down to our own day, varied on occasion by more solid and tangible proofs of appreciation. Perhaps the locus classicus in this context is the amazing account given by the late M. Castil Blaze of the benefit of the famous Mdle. Sallé in London in 1734. "History tells us," writes this veracious chronicler, "that at the representation given for her benefit people fought at the doors of the theatre; that an infinity of amateurs were obliged to conquer at the point of the sword, or at least with their fists, the places which had been sold to them by auction, and at exorbitant prices. As Mdle. Sallé made her last curtsy and smiled upon the pit with the most charming grace, furious applause burst forth from all parts and seemed to shake the theatre to its foundation. While the whirlwind howled, while the thunder roared, a hailstorm of purses, full of gold, fell upon the stage, and a shower of bon-bons followed in the same direction. These bon-bons, manufactured at London, were of a singular kind; guineas—not like the doubloons, the louis d'or in paste, that are exhibited in the shop windows of our confectioners, but good genuine guineas in metal of Peru, well and solidly bound together—formed the sweetmeat; the papillote was a bank-note. . . . Mdle. Sallé put the proofs of gratitude offered by her host of admirers into her pockets, or rather, into bags. The light and playful troop of little Loves who hovered around the new dancer, picked up the precious sugar-plums as they fell, and light dancing satyrs carried away in cadence the improvised treasures. This performance brought Mdle. Sallé more than two hundred thousand francs." The only drawback about this circumstantial account is that there is no contemporary report in existence which corroborates it in regard to the tribute of bon-bons and bank-notes. Still, in view of what has happened in more enlightened times, there is nothing intrinsically improbable in this substitution of mineral for vegetable missiles. Earlier in the century, in the course of the historic rivalry between Margarita de l'Epine and Mrs. Tofts, a servant of the latter was taken into custody for throwing an orange at the foreign prima donna. This form of tribute has, we hope, almost entirely died out, but only a few months have elapsed since a dead rabbit was thrown at an opera singer in Paris by the occupant of one of the boxes.

In our own age Patti, amongst prime donne, and Liszt, among male performers, have been probably subjected to the most extravagant manifestations of enthusiasm. But some of the younger artists have also had to pay the penalty of their popularity. Thus, the presentation to Madame Melba at a recent Nikisch Concert of an offering consisting of a floral lyre standing some six feet high, with a bird-cage containing a bird attached to it, not only "surprises by himself," as Count Smorltork would have said, but is full of interesting suggestions. Madame Melba had just sung Handel's "Sweet bird," so that it is quite permissible to entertain the opinion that the nature of the gift was determined by the title of the song. If this practice should come to be erected into a precedent, we may expect to see some curious scenes enacted on the concert platform or the operatic stage. Thus, after singing "Comin' thro' the rye," the artist should obviously be presented with at least a "pocketful" of that romantic cereal. If again she "shoots an arrow into the air," she should at least be presented with a bow—with two strings or otherwise. Or if she should dream of "marble halls," nothing less than the title-deeds of a desirable mansion standing in its own grounds could with decency be offered for her acceptance. Singers of the "Lost Chord," on the other hand, could hardly complain if the phonetic ambiguity of the title should lead to the presentation of a length of twisted hemp or cocoanut fibre. But perhaps, after all, we are on the wrong tack, and the "sweet bird" was intended to indicate the singer, not the song. In that case there would be adequate grounds for handing a lamb over the footlights to one of the tenors recently performing at Covent Garden, while nothing short of a bull would do justice to the stentorian vigour of Signor Tamagno. In this context we may be pardoned for recalling the fact that, of all public performers, Artemus Ward (according to his own account) still holds the record for eccentric tributes to his genius. For when he lectured for the first time at Salt Lake City, he tells us that the takings included a live pig, two hams, a wolf skin, and a second-hand German-silver coffin-plate.

WAGNER'S "KAISERMARSCH."

EXCEPTION has been taken in certain quarters, unjustifiably, as we think, to Herr Nikisch's reading of the "Kaisermarsch," on account of the freedom of tempo which he employed. This consisted in the main of a slowing down of the pace in the passage, marked sehr gehalten, leading to the second subject, and on each recurrence of Luther's chorale, "Ein feste Burg," and, as a natural consequence of this, included a contrasting quickening of the pace in the intervening passages. Recalling the fact that Herr Nikisch played among the violins on the memorable occasion of the "Kaisermarsch" being performed under Wagner's own direction at the ceremonial which accompanied the laying of the first stone of the Wagner Theatre in Bayreuth, on May 22, 1872, we are inclined to think that what Herr Nikisch lately gave us was not a fanciful reading of his own, but as nearly as possible a reproduction of that indicated by Wagner on the occasion referred to.

Further, it should be taken into consideration that the "Kaisermarsch" partakes far more of the character of a Symphonic Poem than of a march properly so called, and that therefore it admits of a far freer rendering than a mere march would do.

That it is a Symphonic Poem appears from a "programme" of its poetical contents prepared by Dr. Richard Pohl for a festival of the Allgemeine Deutsche Musik-Verein, held at Baden Baden in 1880. *This may well be subjoined here, especially as it probably now appears for the first time in an English dress and is well worthy of consideration. Commencing with a quotation from Wagner's literary works, Dr. Pohl writes as follows:—

"By way of celebrating the return of our victorious army to Berlin, I privately proposed to furnish a music-piece, which might serve to accompany the entry of the troops, and in which, towards its close, the so well organised vocal choir of the Prussian army, while defiling before the victorious monarch, might take part in singing a national hymn. But as this plan of mine would have occasioned important alterations in the arrangements which had long been made in advance, I was persuaded to relinquish it. I accordingly destined my "Kaisermarsch" for the Concert-room, where it may be accepted for what it is worth."

We should be grateful for these few words of Wagner's, for they intimate to us, in the clearest possible manner, what was the line of thought which led the poet-composer to the creation of his "Kaisermarsch." He has furnished us with a grand national picture, contained within the artistic framework of a march in free form.

The "Kaisermarsch" musically depicts the Festival held in Berlin in commemoration of German victories, and the imposing procession of troops along the Via triumphalis. The national, as well as the martial side of this unique Festival has here attained its artistic expression.

We recognise the pressing and surging of the joyfully elated crowd. The distant chime of bells greets the approaching procession of warriors. Feelings of pride for the brave sons of the Fatherland are mixed up with reminiscences of bloody battles and the remembrance of terrible days of anxiety. Thankfulness to the highest ruler of fate and the praise of God, who as "A Stronghold Sure" ("Ein feste Burg") alone giveth the victory, fill all hearts to the brim. As the troops, decked with garlands of victory, march on, the populace breaks forth into shouts of loud rejoicing. The cry "Heil, Kaiser Wilhelm!" announces the approach of the great warrior-king. Louder and stormier as the cries become, they are nevertheless overpowered by Luther's Hymn.

At last the laurel-crowned hero-emperor himself appears upon the scene, and the whole of the German people unanimously give vent to their feelings, as they greet him with the following Hymn of Joy*:

Hail, hail our Kaiser!
Hail, King Wilhelm!
Ev'ry German's pride and Freedom's hold!
Highest of crowns,
Now thy brow behoves its gold
Gloriously won thee,
Blest Peace shall reward thee!
Like new green leavess on ancient oak,
Rewakes, through thee, the German Folk
Hail to its fathers,
To its banners,
Who thee bore, and which we carried
When with thee the French we harried!
Foes to ward,
Friends to guard,
German Realm to ev'ry Folk
A lasting good!

Two cases have occurred in the past month in which the aid of the law has been successfully invoked against the gratuitous performance of music in public places. This fact would, in itself, be sufficiently remarkable, but the details in either case are worthy of attentive consideration. The scene of the first encounter was, so to speak, hard at our gates, being in the classic precincts of Soho Square. Now it appears that "some of the people at the Hospital for Diseases of the Heart" are so enamoured of the music of the piano-organ that Soho Square has latterly become a favourite resort for the "Handelian artist," as these practitioners have irreverently been styled. Nomen omen runs the old saying, but although the defendant's name was Eden, the prosecutor, who resided in Soho Square, declared that he and his fellow-grinders were making the neighbourhood a "perfect Pandemonium." One man's meat is proverbially another's poison, and although the patients—or nurses—of the Hospital for Diseases of the Heart find their sufferings alleviated by the ministrations of the piano-organist, the prosecutor, who was himself "very ill," found the noise was more than he could bear. Eden refused to move when requested by a servant, so the prosecutor was obliged to give him in charge himself. His defence was that he had been called by two nurses and asked to play; also, that when told to go away he was in the middle of a tune and—presumably from respect for the composer—simply stayed to finish it. We rejoice to record that the magistrate of the Marlborough Street Police Court not only fined Mr. Eden 10s., but told him that "he must go away when requested, even though others wanted him to stay." The other case is even more remarkable, though less satisfactory, in that it brings home to us a blessed state of affairs in the provinces from which poor Londoners are still debarred. It appears that in Warwickshire they have made an excellent bye-law that no person shall perform on any musical instrument within fifty yards of a dwelling-house on penalty of being summoned or fined. The Salvationists have endeavoured to claim exemption on the ground that the bye-law was aimed solely at "the ruffians who, with cornet or other instrument of torture, perpetrate all sorts of murderous onslaughts on popular airs."

* From Vol. I., of "Gesammelte Schriften über Musik und Musiker," von Richard Pohl. Leipzig: Bernhard Schlicke, 1883.

* Translated by W. Ashton Ellis.

But the Bench have refused to distinguish between the two sorts of offenders, and although the member of the Salvationist band who has proceeded against pleaded that he and his colleagues had played "in a decent and harmonious manner," he was convicted and fined. All we can say is that in view of this action Warwickshire is worthy of having been the birthplace of Shakespeare. Would that a similar bye-law were only in force for the protection of the London householder!

THE recent visit of a large touring party organised by American organists is a striking testimony to the great advance made during late years by the members of this important branch of the musical profession. The peculiar individuality pertaining to the duties of each organist, and the many obstacles which have to be surmounted before such musicians can conscientiously leave their churches, results in their being almost as much enchained to their organ-stools as were the Bibles of former days to the reading-desks. However satisfactory this may be to the vicar, it is not good for the musical progress of his organist. This has been long felt by many, but it has been left to our American kinsmen to set an example which might be advantageously followed by their English brethren. The American party seem to have had a very pleasant time. They have visited the principal cathedrals and Universities, where they have heard our organs and services and many of our finest anthems. At Windsor they were received by Sir Walter Parratt and listened to the service in the Royal Chapel and Wesley's fine anthem "Ascribe unto the Lord"; and in London they visited the chief places of worship. Their reception by the Musical Association, an account of which will be found in another column, was a commendable act on the part of this Society, and one which was well repaid by the thoughtful and suggestive paper read by Mr. Waldo S. Pratt.

THIS gentleman pleaded earnestly for less isolation of music as an art, and his words are well worthy of consideration. To the music-lover the benefits arising from music being included in the educational curriculum are obvious, but to the non-musical they are not so. Paterfamilias says he has made his way in the world without music, and he cannot see in what way it will practically benefit his son. Convince him, however, that music will make his son more reliable, and a better man, and the aid of the music master will be speedily invoked. If music is to take its place with other educational factors, its practical benefits upon the learner must be plainly set forth. You may appeal with success to the Frenchman and Italian on the ground of the development of the artistic faculties, but with John Bull you had better leave out even the word artistic altogether; otherwise he will ask you whether acknowledged artists are proverbially good men of business, and from the answer draw the deduction that the less a man knows of art the better will be the prospects for his worldly success. Of course, the deduction is false. The brain of the great artist is abnormally developed in one direction, just as that of the commercial giant is in another; and the artist might say with equal injustice that his son should not learn arithmetic because great business men were not artistic. Properly directed, the study of music does exert a great moral force, especially on the young, and however the hyper-æsthetic mind may shudder at art being made to serve any definite purpose, only the plain statement of the real mental strength to be gained by the study of truth and beauty, which distinguish the highest forms of art, will cause music to be accepted as a valuable means of education. Musicians, it is upon you that the responsibility rests! Make and cultivate good music in the highest sense; let it be healthful, invigorating, sane; associate it with noble sentiments and high ideals, and remember that if you want music to be regarded as an educational force it is you who must make it so.

WE learn from the preface contributed by the late M. Hauptmann to Vol. I. of the Bach-Gesellschaft's complete edition of Bach's works, that his original autograph scores were generally written in a very hurried manner, abounded in corrections, and are often almost impossible to decipher. In most instances he has even failed to indicate in his scores the instruments by which his vocal works should be accompanied, and has left them almost entirely bare of marks of expression. The reverse is the case with his band and chorus parts, which he either wrote out himself or at least carefully revised, and at the same time furnished with all necessary marks of expression. It is to these, therefore, rather than to his full scores that we have to look for authoritative directions as to the manner in which he wished his works to be performed. That these should not have been included in the printed editions of his full and vocal scores is much to be regretted, and to some extent accounts for the pale and colourless performances to which conductors, who pin their faith upon the letter rather than upon the spirit of the full scores, have accustomed us. Great as is the service which the Bach-Gesellschaft has done for music in publishing Bach's full scores as correctly as possible, but bare of marks of expression, it would not be amiss if this were to be followed up by the publication of the separate band and chorus parts of at least some of the most important and acceptable of Bach's works, and in which the marks of expression existing in the original autograph parts should be fully given. Conductors might then collate their empty scores with the complete parts, and there might then be a chance of something approaching to an adequate performance, at least in the way of expression, dynamic force, and light and shade.

It is to be feared that the practice of mixing up music and politics is decidedly on the increase. At the last general election it was commonly reported that a Radical candidate in the Eastern counties owed his success at the polls more to the vocal accomplishments of his wife than the cogency or eloquence of his own speeches. In the great conflict which has just been held his name figures amongst the vanquished, from which we may reasonably infer that his wife's singing has deteriorated in the last three years. As a general rule, however, singing at election times is of a choral character. Thus, in the Camborne division, we read in the Western Daily Mercury how the miners would beguile the time previous to the arrival of the speakers by chanting their favourite campaign song:

And have they fixed the where and when
That Conybeare shall die?
There's twenty thousand Cornishmen
Shall know the reason why.

But the most extraordinary and disconcerting musical-political manifestations are those which take place in Wales. Elsewhere the songs sung on these occasions are secular. But in the Principality they combine the sacred and secular elements in the strangest way. Thus, when Sir William Harcourt, after shaking the dust of Derby from his feet, hastened down to accept the offer of Mr. Warmington in West Monmouthshire, he was greeted on his first public appearance with "Lead, kindly Light," which was followed, at a very brief interval, by "For he's a jolly good fellow." The ludicrousness of the incident cannot blind us to its profanity. Hymns are as much out of place at election meetings as music hall songs would be in church.

IN this context we may remark that the value of familiarity is strikingly illustrated by the political song. New or original tunes are avoided like poison. The great thing is to get hold of an air that everybody knows and to re-write or pervert the words to suit the political purpose in hand, just as in the instance already quoted the historic name of Trelawny is replaced by that of Conybeare. A few years back some militant Radicals actually sang, to a well-known hymn tune, some verses in laudation of the then leader of their party, beginning "Great is the power of Gladstone's name: Let Salisbury prostrate fall." Out of respect for the feelings of our readers we refrain from quoting any more of this deplorable parody. Quite recently an evening paper offered a prize of five guineas for the best election song in the metre of "The Marseillaise," and when the award was made announced that the song "had been set to the music by a well-known composer" for the benefit of its readers and electors who might wish to sing it. The music was duly printed, but the "composition" turned out to be nothing more than an arrangement of "The Marseillaise." From these and other instances we think it will be admitted that music hardly derives any dignity from occupying the post of handmaid to politics.

WE welcome a letter from Mr. Corder, printed in another column, relative to our comments in last month's issue upon his recent excellent series of Lectures at the Royal Academy of Music. Mr. Corder asks us if we are quite sure that "that which is born of calculation differs widely from that which the brain produces by unconscious effort." It differs widely in degree if not in kind. In the former the emotional stimulus is at a minimum—in the latter, at a maximum. Is it not highly probable that this is the "something" which gives the "life" of which we spoke? When we said that "in some works the themes were inappropriate to their treatment" we placed our words with deliberate intention. The theme certainly precedes the treatment, but the composer often invents a theme not fitted for the purpose for which he intends to use it. Again, a "melodic phrase" cannot well consist of less than three notes; but, to us, three notes—say proceeding upwards by fifths—have a different character from three notes which proceed by semitones. Hence even a musical phrase can possess "character."

MUCH has been done of late years to encourage the study of music in the British Isles. This is granted by Mr. A. W. Hutton in an article, entitled "A National Opera House," in the last number of the Contemporary Review; but he complains, and justly, that the musical drama has no adequate provision made for it in the capital of the Empire. He proposes that the State provide a suitable site, and erect an opera house, of which this great metropolis may be proud; that the building be leased to managers, "who would run the concern, within certain limits, to their own profit." Private enterprise, as he acknowledges, can do much, and has done much; but it cannot keep an opera going for the greater part of the year, with moderate prices of admission, with free seats for students, and with performances during each season of the best works of all schools. There are difficulties in the way of such a scheme, and of this Mr. Hutton himself is well aware; but until we have such an opera house in London, and similar institutions supported out of municipal funds in various cities of the Empire, we shall never be a truly musical nation. So the difficulties, however numerous, however great, must be faced. Some, directly met, would vanish; others might give trouble; yet, with tact and patience, they would be overcome. One of Napoleon's generals told him that a certain order which he had given was impossible. "Then it must be carried out," was the immediate reply of the great commander. Mr. Hutton pleads the cause of the musical drama. But what about the drama? The State ought to subsidise both. Dramatic and musical performances might be given on alternate nights in the same building, as is done in some German theatres. This double scheme would enlist wider sympathy. And the just claims of Melpomene and Polyhymnia, backed by strong public opinion, could not be ignored by the State. Only let the people ask seriously, and a building will be erected; for, as Mr. Hutton remarks, "what they really desire, their elected rulers have to do." The nation must be forced to feel its responsibility, and exercise its power. A national house for opera and the drama, at present a mere castle in the air, would then soon become a reality.

THE question of State support for opera is, curiously enough, touched upon in another recent article. Mr. J. F. Rowbotham, in the last number of the Nineteenth Century, in discussing the question "How to obtain a School of English Opera," remarks that "Government has never subsidised opera, and on no conceivable ground could be called upon to do so." He adds: "The case is very different from that of an educational institution." Mr. Rowbotham evidently entertains the old-fashioned idea that the opera house is merely a place of entertainment. But, properly conducted—i.e., with serious performances of the best masters of all schools—it is as important an educational factor as schools, the British Museum, or, to name an art institution which actually receives Government support, the National Gallery. One might almost say of music, as Pope of man, that it is "the noblest work of God."

BUT, after all, may it not be the man rather than the State opera house that is wanted? Messrs. Gilbert and Sullivan have created a school of light opera that has been generously supported. Has any like effort been made to create a taste for English serious opera? Some may point to Sir Arthur Sullivan's "Ivanhoe," but there are many reasons why this scheme failed to accomplish its object. Moreover, can it be honestly said that there is need to cultivate a taste for opera in England when most of the best specimens of all countries are well supported? Are English operas as great as foreign? Is there one English opera to which the term masterly can with equal justice be applied to the libretto and music? It is not a question of writing music that will pay. No great art work was ever produced by such an incentive, and a modern opera of any dimension must be a truly great work, or in common estimation it is worth nothing.

PROFITABLE FAME.

THE Nineteenth Century is wise,
So hear it wisely say,
That he who composition tries
Should try to make it pay.

Composers, listen, have you thought
How simple is the way?
To gain eternal fame you ought
To make your music pay.

Perhaps you may be somewhat shy,
Resembling lambs at play,
And that may be the reason why
Your music does not pay.

Or you may aim a trifle high,
To suit the present day,
And that may be the reason why
Your music does not pay.

I am no judge in this respect,
Yet ten to one I'd lay
That surely you would not object
To make your music pay.

I judge of you by other men,
So do not blame me, pray;
The chaps who grovel with a pen
Would like to make it pay.

An admirable thing to do
In life's competing fray;
The men who paint the pictures, too,
Would like to make them pay.

I doubt if any art there be
That says to money "Nay."
The sculptors—few of them we see—
Would like to make it pay.

One last—the lowest class I could,
Undoubtedly, portray—
Poor fools who write poor verses would Much like to make them pay.

O talented composers, you
Are greater men than they;
It seems extremely strange, if true,
That you don't make it pay.

And yet the Nineteenth Century
Can never go astray;
The reason of it then must be,
You won't make music pay.

O self-denying gentlemen,
Who scorn to make the hay
Although the sun may shine—just when
Most folks would make it pay,

For music's sake I beg of you
To change without delay;
It's such an easy thing to do,
Just let your music pay!

FACTS, RUMOURS, AND REMARKS.

MR. J. TYRREL SHEPPARD draws my attention to the similarity between the opening bars of Méhul's "Chant du Départ" and those of the "Death of Nelson." Thus Méhul:—

The close resemblance is certainly suspicious.

THE printer's boy seems active in Dundee at present. At any rate, the London correspondent of the Courier has just been made to say that a certain programme "included sonatas, variations, serieses, scherzos," &c. The boy appears to cherish an animosity against London correspondents.

It is sometimes embarrassing, no doubt, for critic and composer to be acquainted, and the German correspondent of the Musical Courier gives us a case in point. He attended a performance of Sommer's "Loreley," and tells à propos:—"Chance or the wisdom of the committee afforded it that I was placed right beside the composer, with whom I am on speaking terms, and who had the graciousness and good taste to call my attention to the superiority of his music to that of Richard Strauss and other modern composers and followers of Wagner, who made the mistake of leaving everything to the orchestra and drowning the human voices, and all the time while he was talking to me the brasses were thundering away in the most obstreperous and by far beyond the approved Wagner fashion. At the expiration of the second act my position became so embarrassing to me that I changed places." It would, perhaps, have been better not to repeat in public what the composer said in private, but then we should have lost our example.

By the way, the aforesaid correspondent does not show himself entirely favourable to Sommer's work: "His entire opera from beginning to the end is nothing but the most flagrant, outright Wagner rehash; not skilful use of the Wagner methods, such as we find in Richard Strauss, who moreover has always at least something of his own in the way of invention which he dresses up in the Wagner garb. But Sommer is Wagner garbled; it is misunderstood Wagnerism of the most irksome, and, through its very persistency and clumsiness, most annoying sort."

ACCORDING to the same authority, Eugene d'Albert has resigned his post as Capellmeister at Weimar. Probably he could not endure a divided sovereignty, with Stavenhagen as the other king.

AN American paper speaks of a certain "Rev. Hast" as "chief cantor of England." What is this office? Never having heard of it before, I naturally ask.

THE same paper contains a warning to organists against abuse of the tremolo and vox humana: "When we hear the poignant vox humana piercing without rest through themes where it has no possible business the effect is distracting. Out of town organists, players by the sea and on the mountain, where we are now going, are painfully addicted to this vox humana and tremolo. They believe in striking at the very top notch of emotional sensation and keeping you there at tight tension. Sometimes they don't keep you there. The people go out. When asked afterwards, 'Was it the heat?' they say, 'No, it was the vox humana and tremolo stops.'" Reading this, do any of our own players by the sea and on the mountain feel a twinge of conscience?

No doubt some of my readers remember the violinist, Charles Goffrie, who, a quarter of a century ago, was a somewhat conspicuous professor in this country, and a member of our chief orchestras. For some reason or other Goffrie was induced to leave England for America, and now news has come of his death in California. At one time, it is said, he possessed violins to the value of 10,000 dollars, but fortune deserted him in his later years, and he died poor. A daughter of Mr. Goffrie is still living in this country.

THE Musical Courier discusses Max Nordau at great length, heading the article with a motto from W. D. Howell, "If you begin to talk of Nordau, you fall into his vice of abusiveness." The writer illustrates by styling the author of "Degeneracy" a "literary slop jar," and likening him to "one of those Strasburg geese whose livers have been overfatted—very fine liver, but a very sick goose."

M. YSAÏE has been interviewed in Music, a monthly magazine published at Chicago. Many of the opinions attributed to the Belgian violinist are highly disputable. But he tells a good anecdote of Saint-Saëns. "I asked Saint-Saëns," he says, "who you know is sixty-four years of age [according to the books he is only sixty], why he had never composed a string quartet. He replied that he was still too young, and lacked sufficient experience." From the same journal we may borrow the following sonnet from a songbird named Martha Foote Crow:—

My love and I, while the orchestral clang
Was making ready, quarrelled. 'Twas about
Some jest, yet from the music it struck out
All joy. The prelude passed. Then "Love, love," sang
The violins, and "love," and "love." The pang
Of the deep cello-undertones' dull doubt Moaned "death"; then "triumph" soared the horns' clear shout,
And "heaven" in the soft harp strings' vista rang.

Again, "love, love, oh love," the violins
Yearned through the ache within my heart, but when,
So hard besought, I turned and offered—O
That foolish war of loves!—the look that wins
Sweet amnesty from those dear eyes, just then
"O laugh," trilled out my sparkling piccolo!

I take it that this is the first time the piccolo has appeared on Parnassus.

THERE is no getting away from the fact that in the art of picturesque description the average American provincial musical critic can give his English confrère at least two stone and a beating. Take, for example, this piece of word-painting from the Joliet Times, à propos of a visit of Mr. Thomas's orchestra:—

"If high-art music is handling melody like touching off a big set of fireworks at a 4th of July celebration, then it was a high-art affair. If smashing melody into a million splinters as fine as toothpicks is harmony, then their harmony was superb. If splitting the air like forty streaks of lightning with forty different kinds of instruments and shelling a solid steel musical bar into a billion magnetic needles per second is a grand musical accomplishment, then the Thomas orchestra was magnificently successful. We never witnessed such an expert ripping, tearing, hammering and smashing of music in so grandly a harmonious way. It affected us first like the buzzing of all the mosquitos in the world in one swarm; then like the combination of a hundred horse fiddles with forty bazooks and all wild winds in a bleak house blowing in one crack and a hundred keyholes. Then it came down like the roar of a Niagara and left us paralyzed as by a stroke of a concentrated thunderbolt combined from all the rumbling thunders of Jove and Jupiter Pluvius."

Before such criticism we can only meekly bow our heads and own our immeasurable inferiority.

THEY have recently been trying to decide in America whether a certain violin was a Stradivarius or not, and M. Edward Remenyi, the Hungarian violinist, being called to give evidence as an expert, is stated to have said: "I have been playing the violin for fifty years, and I have played on 10,000 instruments." This would give an average of 200 different violins per year. The career of some men is enviable, not so, in this respect, that of M. Remenyi.

THIS is how an Irish journal describes the singing of a popular vocalist:—

"She was heard with rapt attention, and had sung but little when those developments that have lifted her to her distinguished position were recognised. Above all was the brilliancy of her vocalism, the perfect finish that gives the singer's voice distinction and charm. Here was the most notable feature. The liquid richness, the flexibility, and power, had been seized and utilised to secure brilliancy, so that the result was not mere brilliancy of vocal wealth—great purity and ringing sweetness—but brilliancy of training and method. And the vocalisation, which is quite a different thing, calling as it does for effort from the singer and dependent on her perception, was found to be as noteworthy."

FEW London concert-rooms attain the artistic ideal of seclusion from interruptive sounds. Most halls are watched over by a neighbouring church clock, which with obtrusive morality and regardless of tonal relationship informs the musically inclined that the hours are flying. At St. James's Hall there may always be expected the inappropriate tootlings of the bucolic coach horn, the clashing of bottles, and the effects of nigger minstrelsy on unseen but not inaudible audiences; but the distracting power of all these fade into insignificance before the diversions recently caused in a concert-room by the entrance of a bat. A correspondent informs me that the effect produced by the aerial gyrations of this little thing was quite touching. It seemed to be in great haste but wanting in decision. It flew and flopped in all directions, and the faster it flew and the more it flopped, the more the audience wriggled and giggled and ducked. The executant, an unfortunate pianist, did his best to awaken a sense of public decorum, but Paderewski himself could not hold an audience against the vagaries of a whirling bat. There was nothing to be done but to sit with jerking head and rolling eyes until the restless visitor suddenly disappeared in a ventilating aperture which immediately became the attractive centre of expectant eyes.

THE music composed by Mr. Abdy Williams for "Alcestitis" shows some rather remarkable similarities to the music of the newly discovered Delphic Hymn, which is shortly to be published in the Bulletin de Correspondance Hellenique. Mr. Williams made use of the Hypo-Lydian "trope" with modulations to the Lydian and Hypo-Phrygian, and a compass of an octave and a fourth. The new Hymn has a compass of an octave and a diminished fifth; it is in the Lydian and Hypo-Lydian "tropes," and makes use of exactly the same series of notes as were used in the "Alcestitis" music, but in a different portion of the scale.

JOSEPH BENNETT.

HANDEL FESTIVAL AT MAINZ.

(FROM OUR SPECIAL CORRESPONDENT.)

Mainz, July 21.

Two performances of Handelian music, by an orchestra and chorus less than 250 strong, do not seem important enough to draw an Englishman from London to Mainz. But things are not always what they appear to be, and behind this very modest demonstration lie facts, and even principles, which lift it into considerable importance. Some of the facts it behoves me at once to point out. People here speak of royalties with "bated breath and whispering humbleness," but I have reason to believe that the Empress Frederick, always a worshipper of Handel, is just now much concerned for a Handelian propaganda. It was from Her Imperial Majesty, as I am told, that the suggestion came which led to the present proceedings in Mainz, and has, in fact, developed into an association for the spread of the Handelian cult, under conditions adapted, it is hoped, to win acceptance in all Teutonic lands. I have heard it said that London was, at one time, thought of as the best place in which to open the campaign; but the Empress desired that the initial step should be taken where she could show her personal interest, and Mainz was fixed upon for several excellent reasons. In the first place, the necessary man of business was found in Dr. Strecker, the relations of whose family with that of the Empress have long been somewhat intimate. It was the Doctor's mother who wrote the remarkable book on the late Princess Alice, Grand Duchess of Hesse, which received so much attention a few years ago. Then the renowned Handelian scholar, Dr. Chrysander, was found ready to give the enterprise all the advantages of his knowledge, while the Mainz Liedertafel, as also the Damengesangverein, cheerfully undertook to supply a chorus. With so many facilities, nothing remained to wish for but a Mæcenas—some wealthy patron who would stand in the breach of a deficit and, so to say, beat off the sheriff's officers. Such a hero was found in an Englishman, whose name, as he wishes to remain anonymous, I do not mention. He offered to square the accounts when presented, and thenceforth considerations of a balance on the wrong side did not press upon the spirits of the managers, who, indeed set to work quite in the liberal spirit of their benefactor.

I am not here for the purpose of telling English readers anything about "Deborah" or "Hercules," the works chosen for performance. With both, every British amateur is more or less acquainted. His German colleagues are in a different case. Neither of the works just named has, it is stated, been heard in this country, and the fact that at no performance have I seen more than three or four copies of the music in the hands of the audience shows, from our English point of view, that a Handel propaganda in the land of the composer's birth has much to do. The real interest of the present occasion lies in the attempt made, under Dr. Chrysander's auspices, to present "Deborah" and "Hercules" with an approximation to the conditions of their original performance.

First to be noted is that the learned Doctor prepared a "performing version" of both oratorios. Much had to be omitted in any case, but the course taken was not dictated, as it would have been in England, by special consideration for the musical numbers. It followed, for the most part, upon a resolution to preserve, before all things, the action of the drama. This, of course, involved retention of many recitatives and the excision of reflective and didactic pieces obstructive to the story. Dr. Chrysander, for example, cuts out from "Deborah" the chorus, "Now the proud insulting foe"—he, however, retains "Let none despair"—and, of course, a long string of airs is sacrificed on similar grounds. For one, I cannot see anything objectionable in the principle here acted upon. These long Handelian works must be shortened for performance, and it is better to use the knife methodically than at haphazard. Whether English audiences would care for so much recitative is exceedingly doubtful. Our oratorio singers, as a rule, are not strong in that branch of their art. They are good vocalists, but poor declaimers. In Germany, the reverse obtains. The recitatives at this Festival have been scarcely less popular than the airs and choruses, and very finely indeed did the Teutonic artists deliver them.

Another feature in the Chrysander edition is the introduction of cadenzas for the soloists, after the Italian manner. Personally, I do not care for these vocal exercises in works of serious import, but they were almost de rigueur in Handel's day. Moreover, the master's conducting scores, purchased by Chrysander in England, and now in the Hamburg library, contain many of these embellishments as used by Signor This and Signora That. Most of the old cadenzas are, I learn, retained in the edition now under review. Objectors may not like their effect, but they must be careful how they attack them as non-Handelian. Rumour has it that Dr. Chrysander is armed with photographic reproductions of passages from the old scores, and has come here ready to use them for the confusion of opponents. Cadenzas have, however, been introduced into "Deborah" and "Hercules" which are not in the conducting scores. These are the work of the Doctor himself, who claims that they are in accordance with Handelian models. In another respect the new versions of the two works are very free. The overtures in both cases—save for a single short movement in one—are ignored, and, by way of prelude to the return of the triumphant Israelites ("Deborah"), the Doctor inserts the March and Allegro from the Overture to the "Occasional" Oratorio. I should not be surprised to find him armed with a Handelian precedent for this, but it involves his own sanction to the principle of interpolation—a principle easily carried to unseemly lengths. It does not yet appear that Dr. Chrysander's version of "Hercules" and "Deborah" will be published. Indeed, I am told, on what should be good authority, that the editor is averse from such a step. Whatever the fact, I question whether the spirit of English conservatism in matters Handelian would approve the features above pointed out, however much they may be a return to first practices. In Germany the case is different because Handelian sentiment scarcely exists as a force to be reckoned with.

A valuable and very interesting feature in the performances just ended was the absence of additional accompaniments and extra instruments. The authorities kept to the master's score, and made up an orchestra of eighty in this manner: Oboes, 6; bassoons, 4; trumpets, 6; horns, 3 (two flutes were used in a single number of "Deborah"); pianoforte, organ, and drums; the remainder being strings. Handel himself would probably have used more of the reed instruments, but the balance of tone was decidedly good and the general effect impressive. Indeed, this experience of a Handel orchestra (approximate) confirmed me in a belief long entertained that, given proper conditions, Handel unadorned is adorned the most. I was particularly struck with the imposing march of the instrumental bass when, as was mostly the case, the bassoons played with the strings. The tone of the reeds gave not only extra power, but firmness, crispness, and compactness. In passages where Handel "strikes like a thunderbolt," the strident trumpets filled the ear, and the loud, thick harmonies of the organ occupied every gap in the score. The pianoforte, as substitute for the cembalo, was constantly used. It accompanied the recitatives, in association with a single violoncello, which softly sustained the bass, and it stood conspicuous in the airs, sometimes having a distinctly independent phrase. I am bound to say that the orchestral music, as a whole, pleased and satisfied the ear. The absence of certain instrumental colours was of course felt, but the actual combination seemed to suit the music, and in point of grandeur and sonority there was nothing to desire. This, as far as I have been able to ascertain, is a pretty general opinion here, and, so far, the experiment must be accounted successful. The chorus was to the orchestra, in point of numbers, as two to one—that is to say, it consisted of 160 voices.

To wish for better singing, or fresher voices, would have been unreasonable, while the fact that the two oratorios had been assiduously practised since Easter was a guarantee of correctness. The solo vocalists were not uniformly good. Madame Moran-Olden (Deborah) forced her voice unpleasantly, and, though a good artist, was hardly satisfactory. On the other hand, Madame Herzog, who took the part of Iole in "Hercules," was excellent alike in voice and style, as was, apart from a tendency to unnecessary emphasis, the contralto singing of Miss Charlotte Hühn. The prime honours fell, however, to Mr. Edward Lloyd (Hyllus in "Hercules") and Professor Messchaert, a baritone from Amsterdam. Mr. Lloyd we all know, and can take for granted that he charmed the audience with his delightful art. As for the Dutch professor, let me say that I know no finer baritone. To a beautiful and noble voice he joins all the power of a true artist. His appearance in London would make a sensation.

ROYAL OPERA, COVENT GARDEN.

At the time of writing it is impossible to close the chronicle of the season, but it is improbable that anything more of special interest took place after the 23rd ult., as only one small novelty had been offered, and our remarks may therefore be brief. On June 24 Madame Patti resumed her incomparable impersonation of Zerlina in "Don Giovanni," but, generally speaking, a fair measure of justice was not meted out to Mozart's immortal work. The important parts of Donna Anna and Don Ottavio were very poorly sung, and the chorus was slovenly; but Mr. Maurel was artistic as ever in the titular part, though his voice sounded rather hoarse. On June 25 Gluck's "Orfeo" was performed, and Mdlle. Giulia Ravogli once more gave her splendid impersonation of the hero.

Madame Sembrich re-appeared, on June 27, after an absence of several years, choosing the part of Violetta in "La Traviata." Less dramatic than Madame Patti she rendered equal justice to the music of Verdi, her beautiful and perfectly trained voice being as well under control as when she first came among us. A new tenor, Mr. Maugiére, who appeared as Alfredo, was evidently too nervous to do himself justice.

Operatic artists are so prone to consider solely their own interests that high commendation is due to Madame Fanny Moody and her husband, Mr. Charles Manners, for their offer of £100 for a one-act opera without chorus. The trial was made under conditions which ensured impartiality, and the judges selected a little work termed "Petrucchio," which proved to be the composition of Mr. Alick Maclean, son of Dr. Maclean, who was musicmaster at Eton College previous to Sir Joseph Barnby's appointment. The libretto, which embodies a tragic story, is by the composer's sister, who has written under the name of Sheridan Ross. The action is short and brisk, and though Mr. Maclean is of Scottish origin, his music is, for the most part, in the fervid modern style of Mascagni and Leoncavallo. It shows that he has talent, and in due course he should develop individuality. The operetta was well impersonated on the afternoon of June 29, by the Prize-givers, Miss Edith Miller, and Mr. John Child.

An extremely fine performance of "Les Huguenots" was given on the evening of the same day, with Madame Albani and Mr. Tamagno as the heroine and hero; and, on the 2nd ult., Madame Bellincioni played Carmen for the first time here. Her embodiment was marked by much dramatic force, the wildness of the character being particularly accentuated. Vocally she was less satisfactory. "Le Nozze di Figaro" was given on the following evening.

The re-appearance of Madame Calvé in "Carmen" took place on the 10th ult. Bizet's opera has seldom, if ever, been more effectively given; Madame Calvé, Madame Melba, and Mr. Alvarez being especially worthy of praise.

After more than one unavoidable delay, "Tannhäuser" was played in French, on the 15th ult., with the Paris version of the score, for the first time in London, and more attention to the details of the mise-en-scène than usual. Madame Eames was Elizabeth; Mr. Plançon, the Landgrave; Madame Adini, Venus; and Mr. Maurel, Wolfram, while Mr. Alvarez was an exceptionally fine Tannhäuser. It was perhaps the best performance of the opera we have had on this side of the Channel.

On the 20th ult. Massenet's tragic opera, "La Navarraise," was played for the first time this season, with Madame Calvé and Mr. Plançon in their original parts, and Mr. Bonnard as the hero; and, on the 23rd ult., an excellent performance of "Lohengrin" was given, with Madame Eames and Mdlle. G. Ravogli, Messrs. Vignas, Maurel and Plançon. Messrs. Mancinelli, Beviniani, Ranegger, Flon, and Seppilli have officiated as conductors.

GERMAN OPERA.

THE Ducal Court Company of Saxe-Coburg and Gotha ended its first season here, at Drury Lane Theatre, on the 13th ult. Since our last notice the Company has been heard in Smetana's "Verkaufte Braut," "Der Freischütz," Lortzing's "Der Wildschütz," "Hänsel und Gretel," and "Fidelio," and in repetitions of the works already noticed. The operas by Smetana and Lortzing were given for the first time in England, and the latter may at once be dismissed as not at all likely to obtain a foothold. It belongs to a style that, whether for good or evil, has quite lost favour with English amateurs, and of that style it is not even a first-rate example. "Die Verkaufte Braut," on the other hand, found much favour, though it cannot be denied that expectations concerning it had been raised so high that a certain amount of disappointment was felt. The overture to this work, a masterpiece of humour and musical skill, now well known in our concert-rooms, is by far the best part of the score, which, though full of tune, is not by any means remarkable for strength or dramatic effect. Among the best things in the opera are the dances, which on this occasion were admirably done. The whole performance, indeed, was remarkably good, especially as regards ensemble—the strong point of the company. The plot of "Die Verkaufte Braut" contains many humorous incidents, but its main thread is perilously weak. The performances of "Fidelio" and "Der Freischütz" were, as regards the merit of individual artists, far below the standard to which London amateurs have grown accustomed; but the spirit of both works was caught in a manner that might very well be taken as a model by companies of far greater pretension.

NIKISCH CONCERTS.

A REMARKABLY attractive programme and the prospect of hearing M. Paderewski brought a large audience to Queen's Hall on the occasion of Mr. Nikisch's third Concert, on June 29. The great pianist played his Polish Fantasia with customary fire and brilliancy, and threw in one of Mendelssohn's "Songs without Words" as an encore; and very fine renderings were given of the "Leonora" and "Meistersinger" Overtures, which were duly appreciated; but interest centred chiefly on Tchaikowsky's Symphony, No. 5, in E minor, which was then given for the first time in London. The work, which immediately won the hearts of all present, has much affinity with the Fourth and Sixth Symphonies by the same composer, both of which have been heard at the Philharmonic and other concerts. It is less tragic than the Sixth (the "Pathétique"), but, like that work, is marked by great breadth of treatment, rhythmic strength, sustained thematic interest, and splendour of orchestral colouring. It is in the usual four movements, the first being preceded by a slow Introduction based on the chief theme of the Finale. The second movement, a broad stream of passionate melody, is one of the most beautiful examples of the composer's lyrical style; the following piece, a Valse, is instinct with grace, and in the first and last movements dignity and barbaric force are combined with remarkable success. It is to be hoped this Symphony will soon be heard again; in the meantime, Mr. Nikisch is to be thanked for introducing it, and congratulated on a performance that placed the work in the most favourable light.

We are inclined to think that the best interpretation hitherto given here by Mr. Nikisch was that of Brahms's beautiful Symphony in D (No. 2), with which he opened his last Concert, on the 6th ult. At any rate, it is difficult to imagine a rendering of this noble work more calculated to silence criticism. We believe there are still a few minds so impervious to musical beauty that they are able to resist the appeal of this, the most genial of all Brahms's instrumental works. If any such were present on this occasion they must have found it difficult to maintain their stolidity. The Symphony was followed by Beethoven's Violin Concerto, the solo part in which was played by Mr. Achille Rivarde with great refinement, artistic insight, and reverence. Mr. Rivarde concealed rather than displayed his technical powers—which are very great—and by this alone showed himself a true artist. The remainder of the programme contained the “Lohengrin” Prelude, the opening and closing scenes from “Tristan,” and the “Kaisermarsch.” Of the last a highly original reading was given, the tempo being changed so freely that the work appeared rather as a symphonic poem than as a march. A well deserved tribute of applause at the close of the Concert made plain the fact that London amateurs will be glad to see Mr. Nikisch again.

VARIOUS RECITALS.

No pianist within our memory has so quickly won name and fame here as Mr. Rosenthal. The public was slow at first to recognise the genius of Mr. Paderewski, but his rival came, was heard, and at once conquered. We have used the term rival, but the resemblance between the two artists is not great. Truly the Polish player has prodigious executive powers, but he charms most by the depth of sentiment and tenderness of his playing, and also by a fascinating personality. On the other hand, Mr. Rosenthal astounds his hearers by his phenomenal manipulation of the keyboard, and that without any of the tricks and affectations of the ordinary virtuoso; all is done with as much apparent ease as if he were turning the handle of a street pianoforte. The rapidity of his thirds, sixths, and octaves in Brahms's Variations on a Theme by Paganini, at his first Recital, on June 24, at St. James's Hall, constituted perhaps the most remarkable feat ever accomplished on the pianoforte; but we cannot approve the embellishments of Chopin's familiar Waltz in D flat. There was nothing particularly striking in his performance of Beethoven's Sonata in C minor (Op. 111), but the reading was sound and artistic.

At the second Recital, on the 3rd ult., the principal feature of the programme was Schumann's “Carnaval,” and in the final movement of this Mr. Rosenthal surpassed, if possible, all his previous efforts. Pieces by Bach, Scarlatti, and Henselt were also played in extraordinary fashion; but we have often heard Beethoven's Sonata, “Les adieux, l'absence, et le retour,” more effectively played.

Considerable interest attached to the Concert of Miss Fanny Davies at St. James's Hall, on the afternoon of June 24, owing to the inclusion in the programme of Brahms's two new Sonatas for clarinet and pianoforte, which were to have been heard at the Popular Concerts last season, the postponement being due to the artistic conscientiousness of the master, who wished to revise his own works. What changes have been made we cannot say, but certainly in their perfected form the Sonatas are very delightful. The first, in F minor, is in four movements, and the second, in E flat, in three. Miss Fanny Davies managed to secure the services of that incomparable clarinetist, Mr. Mühlfeld, and the works were therefore heard under the most favourable conditions. To pronounce dogmatically upon their respective merits on a first hearing would be grossly unjust. It may be said, in general terms, however, that they are among Brahms's most inspired and carefully polished efforts, the Sonata in E flat being, perhaps, the more genial of the two, the middle Allegro appassionato being in the master's best manner. Amateurs will be glad to renew acquaintance with both works next season. Some small pieces by Schumann were beautifully interpreted by Miss Fanny Davies, and Mrs. Henschel was delightful in Lieder by the same composer and Mr. Emanuel Möör.

The usual crowd of enthusiasts attended the only Pianoforte Recital of Mr. Paderewski this season, which took place at St. James's Hall, on June 25. Beethoven's Sonata in A flat (Op. 110) seems to be a favourite work with this artist, and his reading of it need not be further discussed. The Polish pianist is not so much at home in Schumann as he is in Chopin, but there were some excellent qualities in his rendering of the former master's Fantasia in C (Op. 17). For example, pianists of warm temperament frequently come to grief over the exciting and terribly difficult middle movement; but Paderewski kept himself cool, and played very few false notes. The programme included the same Variations on a Theme by Paganini which were given by Mr. Rosenthal on the previous evening, and minor pieces by Mendelssohn, Chopin, Liszt, and the Recital-giver himself. There was a great demonstration at the close, and the audience did not wholly disperse until three more pieces had been exacted from the too good-natured artist.

Among the pianists who have sought the suffrages of London music-lovers this season should be named Mr. Louis Pabst, who gave a Recital at Messrs. Broadwood's Rooms on the 1st ult. There was nothing in the slightest degree sensational in his performances, but he gave Beethoven's Variations in F (Op. 34) and various pieces by Schumann and Chopin with neatness and intelligence, as well as some musicianly pieces from his own pen. Miss Fillunger was artistic, as usual, in some vocal contributions.

An interesting Flute Recital was given, by invitation, by that accomplished performer, Mr. Frederic Griffith, at the Royal Academy of Music, on Wednesday afternoon, the 3rd ult., a Sonata for flute and pianoforte and an Allegro from another Sonata from the pen of Frederick the Great being included in the programme. We read in history that the monarch was an ardent admirer as well as a skilled executant of the flute, but his compositions were not intended for publicity; in 1886, however, the Emperor William I. granted Messrs. Breitkopf and Härtel permission to publish a volume of the sonatas, the work of selection being entrusted to Phillip Spitta. Altogether about one hundred and twenty of the compositions for flute by Frederick have been discovered. Spitta remarks that, “Although it cannot be claimed that either the King or his master, Quanz, showed any originality in the treatment of form, there yet appears the same mysterious blending of warmth of feeling with dry, calculating coldness, which was a prominent and startling characteristic of his life and action.” The scheme of Mr. Griffith included Brahms's Sonata in E flat for clarinet and pianoforte (Op. 120, No. 2), the executants being Mr. Manuel Gomez and Mr. Septimus Webbe; a well written Suite for flute and pianoforte by Mr. Edward German, accompanied by the composer, and various pieces by Godard, Bernard, and Widor. Songs were contributed by Miss Lascelles and Mr. Arthur Oswald.

Miss Mathilde Verne gave the third and last of her Pianoforte Recitals for the present season at the Queen's Hall, on Thursday, the 4th ult. This young artist, a former pupil of Madame Schumann, shows the beneficial influence of her esteemed preceptor in her touch and style. Her programme on the present occasion included Beethoven's Thirty-two Variations in C minor, Chopin's “Allegro de Concert” in A, which of late has grown in popularity, and minor pieces by Schumann, Liszt, Grieg, Brahms, D'Albert, and Godfrey Pringle.

Yet another pianist! Mr. Jules Hollander gave a Recital at the Queen's Hall, on the 9th ult., and displayed intelligence, if not genius, in a somewhat modest programme, the most important feature in which was Grieg's Suite, “Aus Holberg's Zeit.” He also included selections by Chopin, Schumann, and Liszt, all being neatly rendered. Miss Jeanne Levine, a very refined young lady violinist, took part in the programme.

M. de Greef came to us at what may be termed a dangerously late period of the summer season, but there was a large audience in St. James's Hall at the first of three Recitals on the 13th ult. The Belgian pianist included Beethoven's so-called “Moonlight” Sonata, in C sharp minor (No. 2), and Mendelssohn's Variations Sérieuses, both of which he played with refinement if not with power. He was heard to the fullest advantage in smaller pieces by Handel, Bach, Chopin, Moszkowski, and Saint-Saëns.

The second Recital took place on the 20th ult., when an excellent programme was provided, the principal features being Beethoven's Sonata Appassionata in F minor and Schumann's Etudes Symphoniques. In neither of these did M. de Greef rise to the height of his theme, though he played with taste and fluency. But again he was most praiseworthy in pieces requiring lightness and delicacy of treatment, such as a rarely heard Pastorale Variée of Mozart, Grieg's “Aus dem Volksleben” (Op. 19), and Liszt's “Walde-rauschen.”

ROYAL COLLEGE OF MUSIC.

THE twelfth annual meeting of the Corporation of the Royal College of Music was held, on the 8th ult., at Marlborough House. The Prince of Wales (the President) occupied the chair. Lord Charles Bruce having read the report of the Council to the Corporation, the Prince of Wales, in moving the adoption of the balance sheet and report, said: "I think you will all consider the state of affairs of the College as being very satisfactory. It is with great regret, however, that I have again to allude to the retirement of Sir George Grove as Director, he having from the commencement carried out his duties so admirably in every way. I am glad to say that he will remain a member of the Council and also of the Executive Committee. I believe that in his successor, Dr. Hubert Parry, we shall have one who will zealously walk in Sir George Grove's footsteps, and do his best for the good and advancement of the College." His Royal Highness then presented the Hopkinson and the Challen gold medals for pianoforte playing and the certificates of proficiency to the several recipients.

A large gathering of past and present students of the College assembled in the Concert Hall, on the 12th ult., in order to take part in the presentation of a testimonial and address to Sir George Grove on his resignation of the Directorship. Sir George, on entering the hall, received an ovation, and the proceedings throughout testified to the kindly feeling with which he is regarded by those connected with the College. Dr. Hubert Parry, the present Director, made the presentation, which took the form of a handsomely bound address, and he intimated that a bronze bust of Sir George had been executed by Mr. Alfred Gilbert, but was not sufficiently advanced to present that day. Referring to the services Sir George Grove had rendered to the College, he pointed out that he had enjoyed the unique responsibility of being its first Director, and that it was to him that its honourable status and high artistic tone were due. In addition to his success in organising and establishing the Institution, Sir George Grove had won by his attention, ready sympathy, and kindness the warmest affection of all those who had worked with him and those over whom he had presided. Sir George Grove, in returning thanks, said that during the twelve years he had been at the College he had done his utmost not only that the students might obtain all the advantages possible out of the splendid and thorough instruction provided, but that after they left they might have opportunities of turning their gifts, their knowledge, and their character to best account. He hoped he had never forgotten that to form good teachers was as important a function of a college of music as to form brilliant and fine performers. Though he had not been able to do nearly all that he wished, he could not help feeling that much had been done in the twelve years. In composition they had made some very promising beginnings, orchestral playing in this country had been greatly benefited by the College, the standard of execution of chamber music had been splendidly maintained by the Musical Guild and College Concerts, and they had furnished the country with many good organists, singers, and teachers. Having paid a tribute to those to whom these happy results were due, and to the generous, sympathetic, and enlightened manner in which their efforts had been seconded by their President, His Royal Highness the Prince of Wales, he concluded by saying that during his career at the College he had tried to show that authority was strengthened by affection; that ability and hard work were of no avail except they were backed up by character; that, great as the study of music was, there was one thing still greater—to be good, to be unselfish, to be thoughtful of others; and hereafter, when the bust they so kindly intended to present to him should be set up in its resting-place in the College, he trusted that it might be recognised as the likeness of him to whom those were the great objects of his life.

Some capital work was done at the three Concerts given at this Institution since our last issue. At the Orchestral Concert, on June 26, we heard performances of Schumann's First Symphony and Rossini's "William Tell" Overture; a sentimental and tawdry Concertstück for harp and orchestra, by Von Wilm, in which the solo part was excellently played by Miss Miriam Timothy; and five dainty dances for orchestra, by Mr. William Hurlstone, a scholar of the College. These short pieces are well written and brightly scored, but the melodic interest is somewhat slight. Mr. Thomas Thomas and Miss Eliza Thatcher sang airs by Mendelssohn. The Chamber Concert of the 10th ult. proved of quite exceptional interest by the production of a Quintet for clarinet and strings, by Mr. S. Coleridge-Taylor. To do justice to this work we deliberately apply a different standard from that by which pupils' compositions are generally judged. There is little or nothing in Mr. Taylor's Quintet to betray the fact that he is still in statu pupillaris. His is, indeed, an achievement, not merely a "promise." Mr. Taylor's themes are his own, and very interesting and unconventional the majority are, while the ease with which he handles the difficult form, the freedom and artistic balance of his part-writing, and, even more, the variety and originality of his rhythms, are quite remarkable in one so young. Nor are the higher qualities of imagination and emotion wanting, without which mere cleverness counts for but little. They are most conspicuous in the fine, terse opening Allegro energico, and in the Romance (Larghetto affettuoso), which is as poetic and suggestive a movement as is to be found in English music. In the Scherzo a most complicated rhythm is handled with masterly ease, and in the Finale (Allegro con fuoco) the two-bar rhythm of a theme à la Dvorák, kept up with strenuous persistence, produces a most spirited effect. Towards the close the expressive theme of the slow movement creeps in unexpectedly and helps to bring the work to a worthy close. Mr. George Anderson (clarinet), Miss Ruth Howell, Messrs. Thomas Jeavans and Ernest Tomlinson, and Miss Ethel Uhlhorn Zillhart were the capable interpreters of Mr. Taylor's fine but very difficult composition. At the last Concert of the term, on the 17th ult., the orchestra gave excellent performances of Dvorák's Symphonic Variations on an original Theme (Op. 78), Saint-Saëns's "Danse Macabre" (minus Xylophone), and Sir A. C. Mackenzie's "Britannia" Overture. Miss Ruth Howell played Mendelssohn's Violin Concerto with fluent technique and refined expression, Miss Mary Carpenter was the soloist in Schumann's "Concertstück" for pianoforte and orchestra (Op. 92), and Miss Helen Jackson and Mr. Emlyn Davies sang.

ROYAL ACADEMY OF MUSIC.

THE Duke of Saxe-Coburg and Gotha visited the Royal Academy of Music, on June 24, for the first time in his capacity as President of the Institution. His Royal Highness was received by the governing bodies of the Academy and conducted to the Concert-room, where a short Concert was given by the students, the Principal, Sir A. C. Mackenzie, conducting his own "Benedictus." Mr. B. H. Wallis (Westmorland Scholar) sang "Qui s'adego," Miss Sybil Palliser (one of the ablest of the pianoforte pupils of the Institution) played the Intermezzo and Finale from Schumann's Pianoforte Concerto, Miss Amy Sargent sang an air by Dr. Saint-Saëns, and Mr. Aldo Antonietti, a young but talented violinist, performed Vieuxtemps's "Fantasia Appassionata." At the conclusion of the performance, His Royal Highness presented to Sir Alexander Mackenzie, a testimonial subscribed for by the governing bodies, professors and officers, on the occasion of his knighthood. This consisted of a congratulatory address contained in an illuminated album signed by the contributors, a handsome old French timepiece, and a diamond ornament for Lady Mackenzie. Sir Alexander Mackenzie having thanked His Royal Highness and the other contributors to the testimonial, the Duke then proceeded to the Committee Room, where he presided at a meeting of the directors.

The study of operatic music has made great progress of late years, owing to the breakdown of puritanical prejudice, and work for the stage has now an established position in our leading academic establishments. The Tenterden Street Institution has not thought fit this year to give a performance open to the public, but the operatic class, under the skilful guidance of Mr. G. H. Betjemann, appeared before a circle of friends in the Concert-room of the Academy, on the evening of the 11th ult., in a selection from the second act of Wagner's "Flying Dutchman" and in "Cavalleria Rusticana." In the Wagnerian excerpt Miss Annie Morrison was commendable as Senta, but by far the most promising student was Miss Katie Thomas, who showed much vocal ability and surprising dramatic force as Santuzza. The progress of this young lady will be watched with interest. Mr. Gwilym Richards, Mr. Albert Henning, and Miss Gertrude Bevan may be encouraged to persevere with their studies.

We have already had occasion to speak in terms of commendation concerning the compositions of Mr. Charles Macpherson, but by far the best effort he has yet put forth is the setting of the 137th Psalm, "By the waters of Babylon," for chorus and orchestra, which was performed at the Royal Academy's Concert, in St. James's Hall, on the 23rd ult. This Psalm has always been a favourite with composers, perhaps the most notable setting being that of the lamented Hermann Goetz. But Mr. Macpherson need not fear nor dread comparisons; though he has not employed solo voices there is plenty of variety in his music, and beauty of theme—as, for example, in the section commencing "How shall we sing the Lord's song?"—is happily intermixed with evidence of contrapuntal skill. Much may be expected from this talented young musician. All the students who took part in the programme justified their choice by the Principal, Sir Alexander Mackenzie, who conducted; special commendation being due to Miss Ida Betts for her brilliant rendering of Saint-Saëns's Piano-forte Concerto in G minor.

The Silvani and Smith Prize has been awarded to Michael Donnawell, a native of Pankota, Hungary; the Parepa-Rosa Gold Medal to Bertram H. Wallis; and the Charles Lucas Prize to John B. McEwen.

The prizes were distributed at St. James's Hall, on the 24th ult., by Lady Mackenzie; it was announced that Mr. Robert Newman, of the Queen's Hall, intended to present an Organ prize of ten guineas.

The Goring Thomas Scholarship for lyrical composition will be competed for at the Royal Academy of Music on September 25.

GUILDHALL SCHOOL OF MUSIC.

THE Worshipful Company of Musicians presented to the School recently a scholarship of the annual value of £9 9s. for composition students and this has just been won by Mr. H. Waldo Warner. The same Company's silver medal, presented triennially to the most distinguished student of the Royal Academy of Music, the Royal College of Music, and the Guildhall School, and coming to the last-named Institution in rotation this year, has been awarded to Mr. Lloyd Chandos, tenor vocalist. The gold medal of the School, with the associateship, has been won by Miss Jeanne Levine; the silver medal, with associateship, by Miss Edith Walton; and the bronze medal, with associateship, by Miss Julia Tabb. Miss Nellie Viveash was also successful in taking the associateship. Other prizes awarded are the Lord Mayor's prize, a purse of £5 5s., for soprano vocalists, to Miss Sara Sole; Mr. Alderman and Sheriff Samuel's prize, a purse of £5 5s., for mezzo-soprano vocalists, to Miss Flora Macdonald; Mr. Sheriff Hand's prize, a purse of £5 5s., for contralto vocalists, to Miss Edith Leslie; the Jenkinson prize, a purse of £5, for piano-forte students, to Miss Julia Tabb; the Chairman's prize, a purse of £5 5s., for organ students, to Mr. F. G. Goodenough; the Alexander prize, a book of poems, for elocution students, to Miss R. Isaacs; the Robinson prize (No. 1), a purse of three guineas, for tenor vocalists, to Mr. Frank Ascough; the Robinson prize (No. 2), a purse of two guineas, for the best accompanist, to Mrs. Kate Ward; the Moore prize (No. 1), a purse of three guineas, for bass vocalists, to Mr. John Porter; the Moore prize (No. 2), a purse of £2 2s., for sight-singing students, to Mr. J. McGregor; the Tubbs prize, a gold-mounted violin bow (value £10), for violin students, to Miss Nellie Ridding.

NATIONAL TEMPERANCE CHORAL UNION.

THE sixth annual Choral Festival of this Association, held at the Crystal Palace, on the 2nd ult., included two Concerts on the Handel Orchestra, sustained by about 140 choirs drawn from all parts of England. At the earlier of these Concerts 5,000 singers gave sacred choruses, anthems, part-songs, and glees with good effect, the majestic "Oh Father, whose Almighty Power" ("Judas Maccabæus"), going so well as to elicit an encore. The Conductor was Mr. W. E. Green, of Portsmouth, and Mr. F. Wilson Parish was at the organ. Later there was a Concert of adults, at which Mendelssohn's glorious "Hear my Prayer" was efficiently rendered, with Madame Clara Samuël as the soloist. Dr. G. C. Martin, the organist of St. Paul's Cathedral, was the adjudicator at three choral contests. One of these was for choirs of from forty to sixty voices, each choir singing Smart's "Lady, rise, sweet morn's awaking" and a piece of its own selection; another was for choirs totalling from seventy to one hundred voices, the test pieces being Müller's "May-Day" and Pinsuti's "Good night, beloved"; and the third was for juvenile choirs of from twenty to forty voices. In the last-named, Portsmouth proved the winner, whilst Dowlais and Nottingham gained the victory in their respective classes.

THE TONIC SOL-FA FESTIVAL.

ONE of the most successful of the large choir assemblages at the Crystal Palace this year was that of the Tonic Sol-fa Association, on the 13th ult. The juvenile choir of 5,000 voices, in more than a dozen appropriate pieces, did credit to their teachers, whilst a later Concert, by 3,000 London and provincial adults, was excellent both in material and in execution. The youthful contingent sang George Meritt's "O Lord of light and beauty," an arrangement of Beethoven's "Creation's Hymn," J. Frank Proudman's "The Statute Fair," Franz Abt's "Softly roam, gentle night," and the other compositions assigned them with spirit and praiseworthy attention to expression. Mr. S. Filmer Rook conducted, and Mr. Frank Proudman presided at the organ. For the Concert by certificated adult singers Mr. Leonard C. Venables took the bâton, the programme consisting of the first part of "St. Paul" and choral compositions by Sir R. Stewart, Henry Smart, and H. E. Nichol. The more solid portions of Mendelssohn's elevated work were rendered with a fervour and deliberation that demonstrated how grateful to the choralists was their task, and the effect upon the audience was correspondingly satisfactory. The solo parts were ably taken by Miss Margaret Hoare, Miss Edith Leslie, Mr. Henry Beaumont, and Mr. John Morley. From all concerned the Oratorio could scarcely have received more reverential treatment.

MUSICAL ASSOCIATION.

AN extra meeting of the Musical Association was held on the 16th ult., at 20, Hanover Square, when the touring party of American musicians was received by Sir John Stainer, and a paper read by Mr. Waldo S. Pratt, Professor of Music and Hymnology in the Hartford Theological Seminary, Connecticut, U.S.A.

After a few graceful words of welcome, Sir John assured his guests of the great interest with which musical progress in America was watched "on this side." European musicians, he said, perhaps prided themselves chiefly upon being guardians of the art treasures of a splendid past. There was good reason for this when it was remembered how European nations had evolved a symmetrical scale and sweet melody out of the apparently opposing elements of church plainsong and troubadour love-ditty; how they had learnt to pile melody on melody with bewildering skill in the madrigal, fugue, and polyphonic mass; how they had made instruments tell their own wordless stories; and how they had, by deft juxtaposition, development, and contrast of different keys and rhythms, raised forms which not only gave a distinct beauty to musical thoughts of the most diffident and unambitious character, but which were also found by the greatest geniuses to be unsurpassed as a medium of æsthetic expression. As partakers in our birthright, Americans also shared our guardianship, but with regard to the future their responsibility was greater than ours, for when the story of the great nations now thriving on European soil should be as the history of Rome or Greece, of Egypt or Assyria, then would America have to render to surviving nationalities an account of her stewardship in art. This responsibility was not so remote as to make no call on Americans to-day. If indigenous American art was only as yet in its infancy, it yet needed training in the way it should go. The history of art showed how sadly a nation was thrown backward by the adoption of a false standard of taste, an untrue ideal of the beautiful, and by the neglect of the higher walks of art. It took centuries to bring back to the right path sentiment misdirected during one generation. He felt it to be his duty to plead for their preservation and culture of the anthem, a branch of art so peculiarly national and so essentially a need of English-speaking races. He prayed them to make it their adopted child, for it had in itself the power of teaching impressively, and bringing home to the inmost heart the highest truths of religion. He felt very strongly also that the beautiful plainsong versicles, responses, inflections, and prefaces of our prayers and liturgy should not be lightly thrown aside. The plainsong of the prefaces of our liturgy, as sung now in St. Paul's Cathedral, was note for note the same that rang at least 800 years ago through the vaulted roof of that ancient Cathedral which crowned the summit of the fortified hill of old Salisbury. Not a stone remained of wall or shrine, but the old Sarum office books survived. He fervently trusted that 800 years hence the same splendid musical relics and monuments of early Christendom might be heard rolling through mighty and gorgeous American Cathedrals, might be echoed there from wall to wall, from apse to baptistry, from shrine to porch, until hearers should say then, as they said now, surely such words, set to such music, so ancient and yet so full of life, sung by so many different races through such long ages, proclaim the eternal truth of the Fatherhood of God and the brotherhood of man.

After some appreciative words of thanks from a member of the American party, Mr. Pratt read his paper, which was entitled "The Isolation of Music." This might be briefly described as an eloquent appeal for the increased use of music as a part of general culture. The relation of music as an art and a profession to other branches of human activity was, the reader said, something that in the nature of things could never be fully and finally stated, but no one who looked back over the history of music as a factor in modern civilization but must be struck by its singular separateness from other factors. Instances might readily be found, even in recent times, where musicians have magnified this isolation of their art, as though it were an esoteric mystery to be fully made known only in the secret circles of the initiated. Wherever any line of human effort was elaborately followed as an absolute specialty, as it must be by those who achieve the greatest progress in it, the tendency to an isolating conception of it was inevitable. The extremely rapid development of music in the last two centuries was due to the large amount of this specialistic pursuit of it, and the natural effect of this fact upon the whole popular notion of music had been immense, and music had now, after some strange vicissitudes, pushed its way into remarkable prominence in what was called cultivated society. In spite of these facts, however, it had certainly been the fashion—at least, until very recently—among both musicians and outside investigators either to set music wholly apart from other phases and agencies of civilization, or at all events so to minimise its influence that it might be almost disregarded in any serious and important summary. This disdain of music as a historic fact and a persistent social force was too often merely a part of a sweeping disdain of every artistic factor in culture. The fine arts originated in the play-instinct of man. They were bound to develop somewhat in the directions of trivial amusement, of idle luxury, and even of positive folly. They were often most showy where the moral values of life and the higher energies of society were least regarded or most perverted. Consequently, it had sometimes assumed that the most petty aspects of all the arts were the most characteristic, and that all nobler developments were too exceptional to be carefully weighed. Art had not seldom been considered to be only a surface decoration of life, wholly incidental and accidental to the real substance. Music, of all the fine arts, had been the most subjected to this sort of depreciation, being ranked far below architecture, sculpture, painting, and certainly all the literary arts. The theory of the essential uselessness of all artistic education which Locke had enunciated had been and still was widely diffused in all English thought. The consequence had been that whole systems of popular culture had been organised, with fine art of every description absolutely ignored. Generations of educated men had been trained with one side of their nature quite forgotten. The initial motive to all music, as to the other fine arts, was æsthetic gratification, and in most of its public developments there must remain a large emphasis on the appeal to the senses and to the instinctive tastes, absolutely without conscious moral purpose or any measurable co-relation with the profounder moral aspects of life. In the cultivation of most music, therefore, the apparent values were simply æsthetic. Church music was, however, different from other music, in that it was a deliberate application of an artistic means to ends outside itself, and to ends that obviously belonged to the highest moral and spiritual category. Church music aspired to deal as an interpreter and teacher with the eternal verities of religion, to offer a language for the utterances of worship, and thus in its own peculiar way to lay a directing and animating hand on the immortal soul. Every earnest church musician must base his work on some such daring conception as this, of its aims and potencies. This conception, however, was not the popular one. Too often the merely concertising theory of music cut ruthlessly into his hope and dream, and what he had wrought upon in eager reverence, like that of the mediæval cathedral builders, he saw taken and handled in the same frivolous and wanton spirit that had from time to time defaced and destroyed too many of the precious sanctuaries of Christendom. Or the church musician might content himself with believing that music, like every artistic influence, might at least work as an indefinite emotional quickener, unlocking the gates of the inmost heart, and ministering through the avenue of æsthetic delight to a somewhat intangible growth in the warmth of soul-life. He might appeal to the love of beauty, that its sisters, the love of truth and the love of righteousness, might spontaneously awake. But how often he found that in the popular mind there was either a dull insensibility to beauty or a wide chasm between æsthetic and other mental activities, so that at the best he had ministered merely to a selfish and worldly craving for excitement. What wonder then that the artist came to feel that he dwelt apart, in a different world to the generality of men, isolated and alone? We were, however, surely coming out of the utilitarian narrowness of the older time. There was in the progress of to-day a notable re-discovery of the sensibility as intermediate between the intellect and the will. This was producing a new attention to the fine arts as among the most brilliant fruits of knowledge and the most potent springs of conduct and character. The lecturer then gave some particulars concerning the efforts being made in America to develop musical appreciation by including it in the educational curriculum, and said that: "Either music had the capacity and the right to become far more of a wide-working social force than hitherto or she was not worthy of the prodigious outlay of wealth and energy that had been lavished upon her. Great responsibility rested upon those gifted enthusiasts who pushed their way into prominent positions, that they realised the importance of their possessing breadth of information, discipline of all the mental faculties, and sympathetic sense of the myriad interests and forces of our complex modern life. Greatness might consist largely in being a master in some one field, but greatness in helpless or ignorant isolation was at least half-mastered, if it were not in danger of being half-perverted. The limitations and perversions of music in popular estimation and handling were familiar to all. So far as these removed it from contact with human interests and efforts generally, or dissociated it from other artistic and literary fields to which it was strictly analogous, the resulting isolation demanded our closest study and our most determined efforts to reform. If music deserved to become less isolated than she had been in common thought, and especially in education, musicians must be foremost in believing it and in proclaiming and exemplifying their belief. Music would be to the world only what musicians made it. It might for a time be something less, but it never could be more."

After passing a hearty vote of thanks to Mr. Pratt, proposed by Signor Randegger and seconded by Mr. Otto Goldschmidt, the President gave some interesting particulars of the facilities for the study of music at Oxford and in the Government schools, further particulars on the matter, at the President's request, being supplied by Mr. McNaught.

A UNIQUE CONCERT.

To celebrate the inauguration of the telephone trunk lines of the Post Office a novel Concert was held, on the 1st ult., at St. Martin's-le-Grand, whereby large audiences in the chief cities and towns of the United Kingdom enjoyed a somewhat lengthy programme of music transmitted from London by telephone.

The trunk lines now erected afford communication from London to the Midland Counties, Wales, Scotland, and Ireland, and in response to official invitation distinguished guests were present at Cardiff, Bristol, Birmingham, Hull, Leicester, Derby, Liverpool, Leeds, Glasgow, Edinburgh, Belfast, Dublin, and several other important centres, to listen to an excellent programme of vocal and instrumental music rendered in London.

A full orchestra, conducted by Mr. Arthur Crudge, in whose hands the whole musical arrangements of the evening were placed, performed standard overtures, operatic and various selections; in addition to which the programme, which extended over three hours, included vocal pieces, recitations, pianoforte, cornet, clarinet, mandoline, and concertina solos, and a tune from the bagpipes. The audiences at the various stations declared that the "reception" was perfect, and that everything sounded well-balanced and as distinct as though the Concert were being given in adjoining buildings.

"A MIDSUMMER NIGHT'S DREAM."

LOVERS of Shakespeare have doubtless reason to be so far grateful to Mr. Daly for permitting them to see some of the plays which delighted their forefathers and which are, alas! rarely presented on the stage nowadays, except by enthusiastic amateurs. The debt might, however, have been much greater if the reverence due to the world's greatest dramatic genius had been more fully manifested. It is not within the province of this paper to discuss the shortcomings of the acting and mounting of the "Midsummer Night's Dream," however we may deplore the introduction of pantomimic effects, and the mutilation of the text so ably commented upon by Mr. Archer in the World. It is our duty, however, to protest against the omission of the greater part of Mendelssohn's exquisite "Fairy" music, so completely in accord with the spirit of the text. With an exceptionally good theatre orchestra at his command, all that Mr. Widmer could give us was the Scherzo, a few odd pieces of the Melodrame, and a few bars of the "Wedding March," brought in with apparent reluctance and got rid of as soon as possible. The absurdity of replacing Mendelssohn's appropriate Overture by that of Weber's "Oberon" was only equalled by playing before the fifth act an arrangement of Mendelssohn's "Spring Song," which, beautiful in itself, was utterly inappropriate to the situation, so suitably represented by the triumphant "Wedding March." If Mr. Daly wishes to respect the art-loving section of the London public he will do well to consider all the points which a few candid critics have brought under notice before his next Shakespearian production is presented.

We are glad to learn that Dr. Lemare has definitely arranged for a second Festival at Bournemouth. The programme will include Sir A. C. Mackenzie's "Dream of Jubal" and "The Transfiguration," the new work written by Mr. F. H. Cowen for the forthcoming Gloucester Festival. Mr. Charles Fry is engaged to recite the verses in the first-named work.

REVIEWS.

Novello's Octavo Anthems. Nos. 485-494.

[Novello, Ewer and Co.]

THE issue of this series continues in undiminished proportions. The first on our list for the present is "And Jacob was left alone," by J. Stainer. This is for two bass soloists, the Narrator and the Angel, a tenor soloist, Jacob, and chorus. It is an elaborate and we might almost say dramatic composition, modern in general style and full of musicianly feeling. The close is very touching. No. 486 is "O saving Victim," the words a translation of an "O salutaris," by Rossini. The setting is in four-part harmony, and, though brief, is bold and declamatory; in other words, thoroughly characteristic of the Italian composer. No. 487, "Hark, the glad sound," by the Rev. E. V. Hall, is of course for Advent or Christmas. There are brief passages for solo voices, but the writing is simple throughout—that is to say, in the sedate and sober style of orthodox English Church music. No. 488, "Christians, awake," by Joseph Barnby, is a setting of the familiar Christmas hymn. Here again we have an example of our national methods in Service music, the composer employing broad diatonic harmonies with a few phrases in imitation to give relief. No soloists are required. The next three are also suitable for the Christmas season, No. 489, "When Jesus was born in Bethlehem," by A. C. Cruickshank, has phrases for treble solo, and is generally written in vigorous fashion, though it is certainly not difficult. No. 490, "O Jerusalem, look about thee!" by E. W. Naylor, is a quiet, smoothly written anthem that may be sung full throughout if desired. No. 491, "Break forth into joy," by Bruce Steane, is a little anthem of similar character, fairly bright, but quite unpretentious. We now come to another setting of "O Saving Victim," by W. A. C. Cruickshank (No. 492), for chorus only, but, within its limits, remarkably expressive. We have yet another Christmas anthem, "The whole earth is at rest," by J. Varley Roberts (No. 493). This is mainly full, but there is a tenor solo part. The composition is churchlike and dignified, but modern in feeling, with some measure of contrapuntal interest. No. 494, "Let Thy merciful ears," by Walter B. Bell, is a very brief and simple setting of the collect for the tenth Sunday after Trinity, suitable for a choir that is just attempting an anthem for the first time.

Original Compositions for the Organ. Nos. 228-238.

[Novello, Ewer and Co.]

THE first four of these issues consist of Sonatinas by A. B. Plant, in D minor, G major, A minor, and C major respectively. They are musicianly works in two or three movements, and though not unduly elaborate or difficult, we think the composer has been somewhat over-modest in styling them Sonatinas. The term Sonata might be fitly applied to the third and fourth. The next two numbers are a "Second Rêverie" and a "Third Postlude" by B. Luard Selby. Sadness is the predominating feature of the Rêverie, though there is a middle section comparatively cheerful in character. The Postlude in A has no indications as to the speed at which it should be taken, but we think minuet time would be about correct and suitable to the dignified character of the music. No. 234 is a Fantasia in D minor by Alan Gray, a young composer whose talent has already been widely noticed. The present piece is varied and extremely vigorous, but by no means formless. It is the work of an admirable musician, and those who give organ recitals should make its acquaintance. The next number is the late Sir Frederick Ouseley's fine Prælude and Fuga in A (No. 2), from a set of six. We conclude for the present with three pieces by the American composer, Dudley Buck. They are a Triumphant March in D (Op. 26), very bright and spirited; a Rondo Caprice in the same key (Op. 35), also cheerful and melodious; and "At Evening," an Idylle, also in D, a tranquil and charming little piece.

Ten Pianoforte Pieces. By Henry Purcell. Selected and edited by Norman P. Cummings and William H. Cummings. [Novello, Ewer and Co.]

THIS selection is not very happily named, since, in Purcell's day, there were no pianofortes, and the most important of the pieces chosen were written for viols, with only a figured bass part for the harpsichord; but apart from this initial unveracity, the edition is to be heartily welcomed and should speedily find its way into the portfolios of all patriotic pianists. The smaller pieces in the volume comprise two preludes, two almandes, a minuet, a cello Siciliano, and "A new Irish tune," which last will be recognised by some as the celebrated "Lilleburlero." These possess much musical interest, and, well-played in the bold straightforward spirit in which they are written, would be decidedly effective. They will also be found to provide excellent practice for attaining independence of the hands. The chief interest of the collection, however, is in an arrangement of two sonatas originally written for viols, with figured bass for the harpsichord, the first of the two being the one in F, commonly known as "The Golden Sonata," which attained considerable popularity in the composer's lifetime. The remarkable dignity and masculine vigour and depth of sentiment of this work are well preserved in the pianoforte version, and although the music loses much by absence of the strings, the arrangement will serve the commendable purpose of increasing familiarity with the sonata in many homes. The second Sonata, in G minor, although of less important dimension than the preceding, is an extremely interesting example of our great composer's skill and contains a Largo of broad and expressive character. It should be added that all the music is carefully fingered, and in accordance with what is erroneously styled the German method, but which Mr. Cummings has shown was in current use in England long before the time of Purcell.

How to Accompany. By Annie Glen.

[Robert Cocks and Co.]

EVERY student of the grotesque in music is acquainted with the young innocent (he or she) who "only wants to play well enough to be able to accompany songs," and has yearned to place him (or her) before Schubert's "Erl-King" or Liszt's "Lorelei" on a platform from which no escape was possible. Alas! it is to be feared that few realise how many and varied are the gifts and acquirements that go to make up a good accompanist. These, however, are so well set forth in Mrs. Glen's book that ignorance on the subject is no longer excusable. It is, indeed, wonderful that a work on this important subject should not have been issued years and years ago. The fact that the work now under notice has already reached a second edition shows that the need of such a treatise was felt—which is more than can be said of most of the instruction books flung upon the market every year. It is greatly to the author's credit that, being the first to treat the subject, she should have dealt with it so successfully and so completely. We have, indeed, only one fault to find—that from the numerous and, for the most part, excellent musical examples given of the various styles of vocal music, all of an ephemeral kind should not have been excluded. In other respects the book is quite excellent, both as regards matter and manner, and should be added to the book-shelf of every vocalist and pianist, whether teacher or performer.

The Technics of Violin Playing. By Carl Courvoisier.

[D. R. Duncan.]

THIS little book of just over one hundred pages may be warmly recommended to all violin students. Not a few, and of those who deem themselves fair masters of the instrument will find in these chapters many useful hints and much important information. Mr. Courvoisier not only writes with the decision born of experience and thorough acquaintance with his subject, but supports his precepts and rules with reasons and explanations which carry conviction, and his remarks throw much light upon the causes of prevalent faults and the more subtle matter of good tone production. Some of the comments might well be taken to heart by all students, as, for instance, the following: "It makes, indeed, a great difference as to time and trouble spent over our studies, whether we think out at a rapid rate every detail of action, and give our hands and fingers literally a dictation from the brain at the very first real attempt to do the thing—or whether we try to accomplish it thoughtlessly, mechanically, with just a notion of the final result—namely, a certain musical effect upon the ear." This concentration of thought upon the employment of the best mechanical means to obtain mastery of the technic of the violin forms the fundamental idea of the book. Every muscular action called forth by the violinist is analysed, and the importance of thinking clearly and establishing good habits is emphatically stated and impressed on the student. The independence to be established between the hands is happily expressed in the remark, "Your bow is your breath, wherewith to articulate, to phrase, and to infuse with lyric expression the contents of the music, while the left hand hardly does more than to furnish the notes to be converted into tones." Mr. Courvoisier concludes his excellent treatise by a timely protest against the ambiguous employment of the dot and slur in violin music, a matter to which the attention of composers and publishers may alike be advantageously directed.

Ballade in D minor. For Violin and Pianoforte. By S. Coleridge-Taylor. [Novello, Ewer and Co.]

MR. S. COLERIDGE-TAYLOR is one of the most promising students of composition at present at the Royal College of Music. In addition to this Ballade he has written a Nonet in F for strings and wind, a Fantasiestücke for two violins, viola, and violoncello, a Quintet for clarinet and strings, and a vocal piece for soprano solo and orchestra, entitled "Zara's Ear-rings." All these show distinctive individuality, which also characterises the Ballade now under review. Much interest pertains to this individuality of style, because the composer is partly of African descent and the remarkable use made of various rhythmic devices and the prominence of the barbaric element thus acquire peculiar significance. Violinists will find the Ballade an attractive piece by reason of its freshness and earnestness of expression. The pianoforte part, arranged by the composer from the orchestral score, is also interesting and enhances the effectiveness of the violin part. That a student-composer, yet unknown to fame, should be able to get such a high-class work printed reflects no small credit on English publishers generally, and is very encouraging to young writers.

Antique Wedding Music. By Arthur Nevin. Op. 5.

[H. Kleber and Bros., Pittsburgh.]

MR. NEVIN has written under the above title four melodious and pleasing pieces, consisting of a March, Bridal Song, Minuet, and Evening Song. They show graceful fancy and possess considerable individuality. The opening phrase of the Bridal Song is somewhat suggestive of a lullaby, but this cannot be said to be altogether inappropriate. The pieces are easy to read, and, tastefully played, would be effective.

Three Duets by Popular Composers. Arranged for two Violins, with accompaniment for the Pianoforte, by George Calkin. [Novello, Ewer and Co.]

IN a preface to these pieces Mr. Calkin says: "The custom which prevails in schools of allowing pupils to play in unison, to the practical exclusion of part-playing, has suggested the need of such pieces as are contained in this volume; and it is hoped that besides providing for the want that is felt, they will also tend to modify the custom." This laudable endeavour is well carried out. F. Kücken, Mendelssohn, and Rubinstein are the three composers from whom melodies have been taken and arranged in simple but effective manner for two violins with easy pianoforte accompaniment. The duets would form admirable pieces for "breaking-up" festivals.

Santley's Singing Master. Part II. [Chappell and Co.]

THOSE who have been studying the first part of Mr. Santley's book will doubtless welcome the second portion of the work, which consists of 120 exercises designed to cultivate power of expression and vocal flexibility. The latter, the author justly says, in a brief preface, "is quite as necessary for cantabile as for florid music. A simple turn, if not executed with grace and precision, instead of an ornament to, becomes a blot on your singing; a shake a meaningless wobble; and a scale a disjointed succession of sounds." Some excellent advice is also given concerning the practice of scales, and in these days, when many singing masters are teaching variation of vowel sounds according to the register of the voice in which they occur, it is interesting to observe that this experienced vocalist, who is so justly famed for his fine articulation and declamation, lays down the dictum that "the vowel sound with which you begin the scale must never vary throughout its length." The attention of students may also be specially directed to the comment that "a well executed scale in moderate time will always give the idea of quicker movement than a slovenly scale taken at much greater speed."

A setting of the Te Deum in C. For Festival or general use. By Augustus Toop. [Novello, Ewer and Co.]

THIS musical illustration of the world-known Ambrosian hymn is in four parts, soli and chorus, but occasionally the sopranos and tenors are sub-divided. The style is, generally speaking, broad, dignified, and church-like, with, however, modern feeling alike in the vocal harmonies and the organ accompaniments. The composer has unquestionable talent for church music, but he permits the accent of the words to fall occasionally on the wrong syllable. We do not say "magnify," and "Sabaoth" is distinctly wrong. This point may be mentioned because there is very much that is meritorious in Mr. Toop's Te Deum. Without being in the least beyond the capacity of fairly well-trained choirs, it is throughout fresh and effective.

Souvenir du Château de Westerloo. For Clarinet in B flat, or Alto Saxophone in E flat, with Pianoforte accompaniment. By Nazaïre Beekman.

Cinquième Air Varié. For Clarinet in B flat, with Pianoforte accompaniment. By Casimir Fabre.

Méditation pour Flûte. With accompaniment for the Pianoforte or Harp. By P. A. Genin.

[Paris: Richault et Cie.]

PLAYERS of the above-mentioned wind instruments would do well to examine these pieces, all of which are pleasing and present no special difficulties. The Méditation, in particular, possesses considerable melodic charm, and the ornamental passages for the flute are effectively written. In bar 2 of the Souvenir an F natural has been omitted in the bass of the pianoforte part.

Trois Morceaux de Salon. For Violin and Pianoforte. Op. 49. By Emile Sauret. [Novello, Ewer and Co.]

VIOLINISTS who have acquired fair command of their instruments will doubtless welcome these graceful and expressive pieces. The first is an Andante, skilfully developed from a theme possessing much individuality. The second piece, entitled "Ethelia," is distinguished by melodic grace and contains an episode of impassioned character which provides effective contrast to the prevailing sentiment. A Mazurka, to be played con fuoco e spirito, concludes the volume. This requires for its effective interpretation a vigorous attack and executive brilliancy, but the difficult passages will well repay being mastered.

Gavotte in D. By Jean Philippe Rameau. Arranged as a Quintet for Pianoforte and Stringed Instruments, by Berthold Tours. [Novello, Ewer and Co.]

THIS forms the fourth number of Messrs. Novello's attractive series of Albums for Pianoforte and Stringed Instruments, and is the well-known Gavotte from the great theorist's ballet opera, "Le Temple de la Gloire," produced at the Académie Française, on December 7, 1745. Mr. Tours has done his work well. There is no need to say more.

FOREIGN NOTES.

AMSTERDAM.—Herr W. Mengelberg, hitherto musical director at Lucerne, has been appointed to the conductorship of the Concertgebouw Orchestra, vacated by M. W. Kes, the future Conductor of the Glasgow Concerts.

BAYREUTH.—Frau Mottl, who recently made her English début at the Mottl Concerts at Queen's Hall, has been engaged by Frau Cosima Wagner for the parts of Freya and Gutrún in the revival of "Der Ring des Nibelungen" next year.

BERGAMO.—The memory of Donizetti is to be signally honoured by the erection in this, his native place, of a theatre bearing his name and fronted by a statue of the composer. A syndicate has been formed for the purpose of carrying out this project, with Count Suardi as its leading member.

BERLIN.—Notwithstanding the somewhat contemptuous press criticism of Herr Reinhold Becker's opera "Frauenlob," the melodious and picturesque work appears to have established itself in public favour during the half-dozen performances accorded to it just before the close of the Royal Opera for the annual vacation. As a consequence, "Frauenlob" will probably make the round of German theatres, several of which have already acquired the right of performance.—Herr Max Bruch's new oratorio "Moses" is to be first produced on the occasion of the bicentenary of the Berlin Royal Academy of Arts next year.—Signor Sonzogno, the Milan publisher and impresario, will give a season of "young Italy" operas at the Theater unter den Linden in the coming autumn.—Herr Arthur Nikisch is to conduct the Philharmonic Concerts during the coming season, from October to March next. Among the eminent performers who will appear during that time are Brahms, Paderewski, Sarasate, d'Albert, Burmeister, Leopold Auer, Josef Hofmann, Jean Géraldy, and Frederic Lamond.—The 100th performance in Germany has just taken place of M. Edgard Tinel's Oratorio "Franciscus."

—The Royal Opera House is about to undergo important structural alterations, partly with a view of rendering it more safe in the event of fire; it being likewise intended to lower the orchestral podium, after the example of Bayreuth. In the meantime, the performances, to be resumed this month, will take place at the Krollische Theater, which has been fitted up for the purpose.

BRUNSWICK.—An opera, "Fabian," by Herr Adolph Klager, a local musician and musical author of ability, was recently brought out at the Court Theatre, where it met with a decided success.

BUDAPEST.—In a competition in orchestral composition, opened some time since by the Philharmonic Society here, the first prize has just been awarded to Herr Julius Major for a "Hungarian" Symphony.

COLOGNE.—The first novelty to be presented at the Stadt-Theater during the coming season will be a one-act opera, entitled "Amen," the composer of which is Herr Heydrich, the well-reputed Wagner tenor of that Institution. Herr Heydrich was originally a contrabassist at the Dresden Opera, and is a good all-round musician, having undergone a complete course of study under Dr. Willner before appearing on the lyric stage.

DRESDEN.—The recent revival at the Hof-Theater of Haydn's comic opera "Lo Speciale" ("Der Apotheker," in the German version) was a distinct success. The pleasing little work, with its conventional but amusing action (skilfully contracted by the adapter of the libretto, Dr. Hirschfeld, from its original three into one act), exhibits the "father of the symphony" in the hitherto scarcely suspected character of a forerunner of Mozart in comic opera.

FRANKFORT-ON-MAIN.—Just previous to the close of the Stadt-Theater for the holidays, the management brought out a charming and highly appreciated novelty, "Janie," a musical idyl, in three acts, by Jaques Dalcroze, the libretto by Ph. Godet, ably translated into German by Felix Vogt. The score, interesting throughout, is especially strong in its orchestration.—The directors of the Raff Conservatorium have just issued their annual report, from which it appears that that very ably-conducted Institution, during the academical year just closed, numbered 144 students—viz., 132 German, 5 English, and the remainder of other nationalities. It has a staff of twenty professors.

FLORENCE.—Arrigo Boito's opera "Nerone," for so many years vainly talked of and anticipated as to have become almost a myth, has, some Italian journals assure us, at length become a reality. It is added that the completion of the work was brought about by Verdi, who humorously declined to undertake the setting of a new libretto, offered him by the composer of "Mefistofele," until the latter had put the finishing touches to his own "Nerone." The story is pretty enough, even though it may leave some lingering doubts still on the mind as to its accuracy.

GENOA.—Signor Leoncavallo has, it is said, just completed the score of the opera "Roland von Berlin," for which the late Emil Taubert had furnished the libretto, and intends personally to deliver his work to the Kaiser. Meanwhile, another opera, "Roland," is being signalled from the pen of the Maestro Puccini.

GHEENT.—M. Gevaert's long-expected important work, "La Melopée antique dans l'église latine," has just been published here by M. Ad. Hoste. It forms a pendant to the learned author's standard work, "Histoire et théorie de la musique de l'antiquité," published some years since.

HONOLULU.—It will be news to many that this, the capital of Hawaii, has been for some years in the possession of an opera house, in which an annual series of performances is being given by an operatic company from San Francisco. There is here, moreover, an excellent military band of native musicians, under the able direction of Herr Berger, whom the German Government sent over some years since at the request of King Kalakaua.

LANGWETHEN (RUSSIA).—The recent celebration here of the "diamond" wedding of Preceptor Werner affords a glimpse of the "patient merit" characterising the work of the typical provincial schoolmaster. Not only does the veteran pedagogue still daily wield his sceptre in a crowded schoolroom, but he also conducts the singing of his excellently-trained choir during service on Sundays. All honour to the worthy preceptor of Langwethen!

LEIPZIG.—The publication has just been completed, by Messrs. Breitkopf and Härtel, of the monumental work entitled "Deutscher Liederhort," a collection in three volumes of over 3,000 German Volkslieder, gathered with erudition and indefatigable zeal by the late Johann Erk, of Berlin, and edited, after the decease of the latter, by Herr Boehme, under the auspices of the Royal Saxon Government. A large number of exquisite folk-songs are here published for the first time.—Professor Hermann Kretzschmar, of Leipzig, and Herr Eugen d'Albert, of Weimar, have been elected members of the directorate of the Allgemeine Deutsche Musik-Verein.

MILAN.—A new ballet, entitled "Venus," is in course of being mounted at La Scala, involving some special practising on the part of a number of coryphées, who in the new work will have to execute a divertissement on bicycles! The once graceful art of a Vestris and a Taglioni is apparently advancing rapidly, though scarcely in the right direction.—A new opera by the Cremonese Maestro, Ferri, has been accepted for performance at La Scala, the work being entitled "Chopin." The conception of the Polish tone-poet and Georges Sand as the respective hero and heroine of an opera must be allowed to be distinctly precious.

—Amongst the artists already engaged for the coming operatic season may be mentioned Madame Lola Beeth, the Viennese prima donna, who is to appear in "Fidelio"; Madame Huguet; the famous baritone, Kaschmann; and the tenors, Garulli and Dombrowski.—The Maestro, Pietro Florida, whose opera, "Maruzza," has met with conspicuous success at recent first performances at Turin and Venice, has been commissioned by Messrs. Ricordi, the well known publishing firm, to write new operatic works, of different genre, of which, as in the previous instance, Signor Florida is to be his own librettist.

MUNICH.—In the absence this year of representations at the Bayreuth Theatre, two complete cycles of Wagner's works will (as previously stated by us) be given at the Hof-Theater during the present and next month respectively. First cycle:—"Die Feen" (3rd inst.), "Rienzi" (8th), "Der fliegende Holländer" (11th), "Tannhäuser" (13th), "Lohengrin" (15th), "Rheingold" (17th), "Walküre" (18th), "Siegfried" (20th), "Götterdämmerung" (22nd), "Tristan" (25th), and "Die Meistersinger" (27th). The September cycle will take place in the order and on dates exactly corresponding with the above, so that September 27 will see the last performance of the series. There will, however, be extra representations of "Tristan" on the 29th inst. and of "Die Meistersinger" on September 1, under the direction of Herr Hermann Levi.—The well known painter, Friedrich Bodenmüller, is exhibiting just now, at the Academy of Fine Arts here, a series of three pictures, intended to illustrate Beethoven's "Moonlight" Sonata, which are attracting considerable attention.

PAMPELUNA.—A series of interesting Concerts was given here last month, in which Madame Bertha Marx-Goldschmidt and Señor Sarasate took part. These Concerts, which were instituted by the great Spanish violinist some twenty years since, are of annual recurrence, the receipts being given to the poor of this, his native town.

PRAGUE.—A new opera, by Carl Bendl, entitled "Mother Milo," achieved a signal success upon its first representation towards the end of the season just concluded at the National Theatre.

ROME.—An interesting season of opéra seria is to be inaugurated, in November next, by the impresario, Alfredo Collina, at the National Theatre, in the course of which several new works by Italian composers are to be brought out for the first time. Amongst the artists engaged are named Madame Anna Stehle and the tenor, Garbin.—Signor Mascagni, who appears to be resting for a while upon his operatic laurels, has assumed (or rather resumed, for we owe to him already an auto-biography) the literary pen in a series of articles on "Libretti e librettisti," and, of course, "I critici musicali," to whom, generally, he owes more of his success than the composer of "Cavalleria" is probably aware.

ST. PETERSBURG.—Considerable interest having been awakened in Russia of late years in the collection and preservation of old native folk-songs, as handed down by tradition, a section of the Geographical Society has now, at the instance of the Emperor, been specially commissioned to make a systematic search in the different provinces, the results to be published from time to time.

STUTTGART.—Herr Zumpfe, the excellent Conductor at the Royal Opera, is about to retire from his position, and has accepted the conductorship of the Kaim-Orchestra, of Munich, an institution of rapidly growing importance in Southern Germany. Herr Zumpfe's successor here will be Dr. Aloys Oebst, a sterling musician who has already won his spurs as an orchestral conductor at Rostock and Augsburg.

TUBINGEN.—An Aria by Mozart, hitherto considered lost, and deplored as such in the latest edition of Jahn's biography of the master, has just been brought to light. We refer to the air "Ah, non lasciarmi, no," in Metastasio's "Didone abbandonata," composed for Frau Dorothea Wendling, in Mannheim, in 1778. An undoubted copy of this most interesting, and, it is said, particularly valuable composition has been discovered by Dr. Kauffman, the academical music director here, amongst papers belonging to his late father, who was an ardent collector of Mozartiana.

VIENNA.—The 300th performance of "Il Trovatore" was recently recorded at the Imperial Opera, where Verdi's chef d'œuvre was first produced in 1854. This is the highest number of performances accorded here to an opera by any living composer.—Signor Leoncavallo's new opera, "Medicis," is to be brought out in November next at the Imperial Opera, under the personal supervision of the composer.—Johannes Brahms is just now engaged upon the setting of a number of charming Lieder, written in her native dialect by a peasant woman in East Prussia, Johanna Ambrosius, whose poetic gift has only recently been brought to light.—A new ballet, "Die Blumenfee," the scenario by Herr Birkmeyer, formerly of the Imperial Opera, the music by Herr Noues, is shortly to be produced at the new Carl Theatre, under the direction of Herr Jauner.—Anton Bruckner, who has just recovered from a serious illness, has accepted the gracious offer of the Emperor of a summer residence at Schloss Belvedere, in the vicinity of the capital, where the veteran musician is engaged upon the composition of a new symphony, his ninth.—Johann Strauss's latest composition, the "Lenbach Walzer," has a little history attached to it. Some years since the eminent painter, Lenbach, invited Strauss and his wife to his home in Munich, where he painted both their portraits, considered masterpieces by all who have seen them, but for which the artist refused to accept any remuneration. Johann Strauss's revanche for the delicate compliment has now appeared in the dedication of the "Lenbach Walzer."

WEIMAR.—Weimar has been passing through what is here called a Capellmeister crisis, provoked by the appointment of Herr d'Albert and the projective additional appointment of Herr Stavenhagen to a Capellmeistership at the Hof-Theater. The question of precedence in authority naturally arising, the former tendered his resignation, which, after repeated application, has at length been reluctantly accepted by the authorities. In addition to this event, though not necessarily connected therewith, Herr Bronsart von Schellendorf, for many years the Intendant of the Hof-Theater, has likewise resigned his position. He is to be succeeded by Herr von Vignau, who has held a similar appointment at the Court Theatre of Dessau.

ZITTAU.—Preparations are going forward for the celebration here, on the 16th inst., of the birth-centenary of Heinrich Marschner, who was a native of this town.

MUSIC IN BIRMINGHAM.

(FROM OUR OWN CORRESPONDENT.)

EVER for the month of July there has been an unusual lull in local musical circles and, consequently, there is little of importance to record. We are hardly likely to be aroused from our present lethargy until the middle or the end of September, when our busy season approaches. Just now, the principal Concerts are dispensed al fresco, and very delightful it is to roam through our numerous well laid-out parks and to listen to the various local bands, and still more interesting is it to watch the crowds of artisans who avail themselves of the privilege given them to hear all kinds of music, without any charge of admission being made. This sudden innovation of giving free music in our parks is of recent date and originated two or three summers ago, when a committee of gentlemen banded themselves together to provide this much needed want. The matter was taken up with the wonted spirit which characterises our citizens, and now the institution of park music has proved one of the happiest and most successful features in the musical history of this city.

Some excellent grand Military Concerts were given at the Edgbaston Botanical Gardens by the bands of the Royal Marine Light Infantry (Portsmouth Division), under the direction of Mr. George Miller, and the Royal Horse Guards (Blues), conductor, Mr. Charles Godfrey. The latter band specially attracted a highly representative and fashionable assembly, both in the afternoon and evening, the programme having been modelled with a view to please all tastes. The most noteworthy and best arranged selections were from "Hänsel und Gretel," "The Chieftain," and "The Shop Girl." A delightful Gipsy Suite, by German, and Mr. Godfrey's Fantasia, "Reminiscences of Handel," found special favour with the audience. Mention should also be made of the excellent rendering of the "Tannhäuser" and "Ruy Blas" Overtures.

Some good work is done by the pupils of the Birmingham and Midland Institute School of Music, and a marked progress was shown by the students of the orchestral classes, under Mr. Fred. Ward's direction, at their recent Concert given in the large Lecture Theatre of that Institution. Some decided progress was also shown by the pupils of the advanced pianoforte classes at a miscellaneous Concert, where the various branches taught in the School of Music are periodically represented. The least satisfactory result, in my opinion, is in the solo singing, and it only tends to show that both in method and style much has to be done in this special branch of musical education ere pupils can exhibit in public.

The free Organ Recitals given by Mr. C. W. Perkins (the City Organist) every Wednesday afternoon, in the Town Hall, is another welcome institution, for which we have to thank the city authorities. The attendance varies from three to four hundred or more, and the excellently arranged programmes, which, as a rule, include excerpts from all schools, are greatly appreciated. I gladly refer here to a charming "Air varié" (in manuscript), specially written for Mr. Perkins for the organ by our esteemed townsman Mr. Andrew Deakin, which Mr. Perkins included in his last programme. It is framed on strictly classical lines and is Mozartean in character.

Mr. A. E. Daniel, a local well known musician who has already produced several choral works, songs, &c., achieved lately considerable success by his new composition, an Orchestral Overture, which was admirably played by the Empire Palace Orchestra, under Mr. Grimmer's baton. The Overture opens with an Adagio in A minor and is followed by an Allegro moderato in A major, in which the composer displays some fine orchestral colouring and a sound knowledge of counterpoint. The whole character of the work is bright and spontaneous.

A Concert was given in the Masonic Hall, on the 16th ult., by Madame Moriani, an eminent singing teacher of Brussels, for the purpose of bringing out some of her pupils. Among them were the Misses Florence and Bertha Salter, who have already made their début in London, Mdle. Alice Verlet, Miss Rosina Hammacott, and Miss Ethel Marsh. Mons. Louis Hillier, violinist, contributed several solos. Madame Moriani informs me that her pupil, Mdle. Alice Verlet, has just been engaged as prima donna at the Opéra Comique, Paris.

MUSIC IN LIVERPOOL.

(FROM OUR OWN CORRESPONDENT.)

THE dulness of the present period was relieved, on the 10th ult., by a visit of the Evangelist's Church music party to Liverpool. These enthusiastic Americans, to the number of about eighty, spent the preceding day in Chester, when Dr. J. C. Bridge officiated at the Cathedral organ; the programme of services for the day including some of his compositions. The trip to Liverpool followed, and it had been a part of the scheme to view the Hope-Jones Organ Works, but this was not actually accomplished, and a visit to St. George's Hall sufficed to fill up the time at disposal. Mr. H. A. Branscombe had been happily selected as a representative local organist for the occasion, and performed the following programme: March for a Church Festival (Best), Aria in B flat (Smart), Sonata (No. 1) in F minor (Mendelssohn), Selection, "Faust" (Gounod-Branscombe), Allegretto from "Italian" Symphony (Mendelssohn), and Toccata in F (Bach). After the Recital Mr. Branscombe invited the party into the organ gallery, where they examined and tried the "Willis" instrument. They were greatly impressed with the sonority and beauty of the diapasons and the characteristic tone and exceptionally good attack of the reeds. They expressed the idea that nothing finer would be heard throughout their tour, and the surroundings of the magnificent hall lent a special charm to all they heard. After a visit to the Walker Art Gallery, and lunch, the party continued their tour, and left the second city for its rival, Manchester.

Application to Mr. Broadbent, Secretary of the Philharmonic Society, as to the works to be produced next season, has elicited a reply to the effect that the "arrangements are not yet completed." The reason for such mystery is not apparent, the following having been, to all intents and purposes, fixed upon by the committee. For the first Choral Concert, Handel's "Alexander's Feast" and Goring Thomas's "Song of the Skylark"; at Christmas time, Mendelssohn's "Hymn of Praise," and for the closing evening, Saint-Saëns's "Samson and Dalila." During the season there will also be a performance of Beethoven's "Choral" Symphony, and the bi-centenary of the death of Henry Purcell will be celebrated by the revival of some of his music. Sir Charles Hallé retains his position as conductor, and Mr. H. A. Branscombe that of chorus-master and organist.

The Organ Recitals in St. George's Hall, on June 29, were again given by Mr. J. Herbert England, a young organist of great promise, and, on the 6th ult., Mr. Edwin

H. Lemare, of Holy Trinity, Sloane Square, was the organist. Mr. Lemare presented programmes of great variety and interest and there was a large audience, especially at the evening Recital.

MUSIC IN MANCHESTER.

(FROM OUR OWN CORRESPONDENT.)

A KIND of St. Martin's summer in music has brought to us much brightness to relieve the monotony of the quiet months, and to soothe us amid the excitement of politics and the uproar of elections. The lengthened visit of what is called the Répertoire Company of Mr. D'Oyly Carte proved very successful, and the opportunity afforded of again comparing the various works in which Mr. Gilbert and Sir Arthur Sullivan co-operated was welcome. It would, of course, be easy to point out vocal deficiencies, but, on the other hand, it would be difficult to imagine a greater all-round efficiency, and to show how, with pecuniary safety, any higher talent could be secured. Altogether, the position of light opera has been strengthened; the readiness attested of the public to enjoy a perfectly healthy and innocent, while truly artistic pleasure; and it has been a relief to have a good hearty laugh at the absurd complications of the librettist, without being brought into contact with any distasteful matter.

The last Saturday in June brought the annual Degree day of the Victoria University, when Dr. Hiles (the acting Professor) presented Mr. T. Herbert Ingham for graduation as a Bachelor of Music. It is understood that the attendance upon classes in which the three years' course of study provided in the Owens College (the seat of the University) is pursued, under the guidance of Dr. Hiles, is rapidly increasing, and that each year may be expected to show a growing efficiency. The conditions for the higher degree have now been tabulated, and the requirements show not only a very careful provision for the scholastic training of the students, but a wise recognition of the importance of a modernised tone. The higher music of the Concert-room, as well as of the Church, is to be kept steadily in view.

At the Royal Manchester College of Music the annual examinations occupied the whole of the first week in July, the mornings being devoted to the serious inspection of the students in their class-rooms, and the afternoons to public performances in the charming little concert-room of the Institution, and to the testing, in the larger theatre of the Owens College, of all the pupils in harmony and composition by a series of graded papers drawn up by Dr. Hiles. The results have abundantly proved the excellence of much of the training given in the College of Music during the two years since its foundation, and have confirmed the hope of its promoters that the College may soon prove its claim to rank with the best European schools of art. The Principal, Sir Charles Hallé, accompanied by Lady Hallé, sailed on Saturday, the 13th ult., for a professional tour in Southern Africa, well pleased with the result of his superintendence of the young Institution, of which the buildings are to be greatly enlarged during the present vacation.

And summer brings, also, public examinations of various kinds—band and choral contests. Following the Tonic Sol-fa Festival (at which Dr. Roland Rogers, of Bangor, presided), the Philharmonic Society, of Mr. G. W. Lane, held its annual Choral Competition in the Botanical Gardens, on the 13th ult. In awarding the three prizes to the Hanley Vocal Union (Mr. Garner), the Werneth Vocal Society (Mr. Jackson), and the Newcastle Ebenezer Choir (Mr. S. Hughes), Dr. Hiles, the umpire, spoke of the indebtedness of the public to those enthusiasts in song who so disinterestedly give labour and time to the cultivation of that part-singing, a love of which has ever been a characteristic of our race, and who are ready, ever and anon, to measure their attainments against those of their sisters and brothers who in other districts similarly devote themselves.

MUSIC IN OXFORD.

(FROM OUR OWN CORRESPONDENT.)

THE Summer Term in Oxford is the great time for College Concerts, and about half of the Colleges attempted to entertain their friends in this way. Some of them did not rise above a miscellany of ballads and part-songs, of no particular interest; but good performances with chorus and orchestra were given of Handel's "St. Cecilia's Day" and Bach's "Coffee Cantata" (Keeble College), Dr. Mee's "Delphi" (Queen's College), Bennett's "May Queen" (Merton), and Romberg's "Lay of the Bell" (St. John's). Only one absolute novelty was produced, a very taking choral piece, called "Woods that wave o'er Delphi's steep," by Dr. Sangster, which received a good rendering at Queen's College, and was much applauded. The same remark will apply to the only instrumental novelty, a Suite for string orchestra by Mr. Woods, which was included in the Exeter College programme. The principal symphonies were Haydn's in E flat major (Queen's), Mozart's "Jupiter" (Merton), and Haydn's G major and Mozart's G minor (Balliol). The standard of performance attained was decidedly high.

The Cowley St. John Vocal Society gave a very good account of itself in Mendelssohn's "Athalie," and the Choral and Philharmonic Society presented a Madrigal programme, the bulk of which was contributed by musicians who have at various times been conductors of the Society.

As usual, a number of well-known performers have appeared at various times and in various places, though, also as usual, without attracting many auditors. The University Musical Union held a great Festival Meeting at the beginning of the term, but the proceedings were not open to the public.

MUSIC IN PARIS.

(FROM OUR OWN CORRESPONDENT.)

THE musical season is now quite at an end, except that the Opera still continues to give its representations. All those belonging to the personnel of our great orchestras have dispersed themselves among the seaside resorts and towns celebrated for their waters. The "Grand prix de Rome" was awarded to M. Letoury, a pupil of M. Charles Dubois, and the second "Grand prix" to M. Max d'Ollone, a pupil of M. Massenet. The different sections of the Institution have met together in order to settle the programme for the fêtes of its centenary; these fêtes will take place on and from October 23 to 26. The members and foreign correspondents will be invited amongst others. Guiraud's opera, which M. Saint-Saëns has just completed, will be named "Frédégonde," its original title, "Bruneilda," being abandoned.

"Xavière," an opera by M. Charles Dubois, will be put into rehearsal as soon as the Opéra Comique re-opens.

Madame Carvalho, the celebrated French singer, whose death is recorded in another column, was a delightful vocalist; in her, Marguerite and Juliette found an interpreter whom the most famous singers have not succeeded in banishing from our minds. Her funeral was the occasion for an important musical demonstration, in spite of the absence of nearly all the members of the Opéra Comique.

A new work, entitled "Quelques remarques sur l'exécution du 'Tannhäuser' de Richard Wagner à l'Opéra de Paris en Mai, 1895," by M. d'Harcourt, the Conductor of the "Harcourt" Concerts, is in course of publication.

MUSIC IN AMERICA.

(FROM OUR OWN CORRESPONDENT.)

THE dull season is now at its height—or depth—so far as performances are concerned. New York affords little to hear, except in the way of light opera, and not very much in that. "The Sphinx," a work which has had a rather unusual success in Boston, has just been brought out here, and seems likely to enjoy a fair run. The music is from the pen of the Organist of Emmanuel Church, Boston, and is clever and well adapted to the rather exuberant farce of the book. Mention should not be omitted of an excellent series of representations of German light opera which are being given at Terrace Garden, where a most capable company is presenting the brightest and merriest compositions of this class; and as the theatre is located in a section of the city where there is a large German population, these performances are meeting with a well deserved success.

At Brighton Beach Mr. Seidl and his orchestra have just begun their summer season, which will last until well into September. The programmes are selected with extreme care and embrace a very wide range, extending from Wagner to Strauss, with an occasional Concert devoted to the works of one composer. The last of these, at date of writing, was a Liszt evening.

Gilmore's famous military band, which is now under the leadership of that most capable violoncello player, Mr. Victor Herbert, has obtained the contract for the music at the Southern Industrial Exposition, which will open at Atlanta, Georgia, in September. Mr. Herbert will direct the band in person during the entire time of its stay at Atlanta except for about a week, when he will visit one of the western cities to superintend the production of a new light opera of his composition.

A musical Festival of some importance came to a close on June 12, at Wilkesbarre, Pa. Its character was in many respects similar to that of the Welsh Eisteddfod, there being a number of competitions for choral singing. One of the compositions upon which the choirs were tested was a chorus from Dr. Mackenzie's "Colomba." An interesting feature of the Festival was a competition between six choirs of women, each conducted by a woman. The Wilkesbarre ladies won this contest. There is a very large Welsh population in the region about Wilkesbarre, which is a coal mining country, and the Eisteddfod consequently thrives better there than in some other American localities where the attempt has been made to introduce it.

The academic year at Yale College has closed with great credit to the new department of music. Heretofore the Battell chair of music at Yale has been little more than a foundation which provided the chapel organist for the college, and has supplied some desultory lectures. Since the appointment of Mr. Horatio W. Parker to the chair of theoretical music, and of Mr. Samuel S. Sanford to that of applied music, a systematic curriculum has been established, and a vigorous effort made to give the college a standing as a centre of musical activities. At the commencement exercises this year Professor Parker contributed a setting of an Ode from the always ready and graceful pen of Mr. Edmund C. Stedman (a Yale alumnus), which is said to be one of the composer's best efforts. Mr. Parker has devoted himself with diligence to the organization of a local orchestra, to such good purpose that at the commencement exercises he had brought together a band of sixty resident musicians, and had them in sufficient training to undertake the accompaniments to his "Ode," besides the "Egmont" Overture, Svendsen's "Coronation March," and other selections. The corporation of the University is seconding Professor Parker's efforts on behalf of his orchestra, and the prospects for music in New Haven are brightening.

The American College of Musicians has just completed its annual examinations, held in New York. This organisation originated in 1884 as an outcome of a desire among the more prominent of American musicians to fix some standard of technical and theoretical proficiency which should determine the professional status of persons intending to teach music. Its faculty serve, of course, gratuitously, and at the sacrifice of considerable time and personal convenience. The college has been hampered in former years by the want of a local habitat, and by the usual public indifference to the thoroughness of musical training. For some years the need of having the institution regularly incorporated and invested with some official power to grant certificates (they are not called "degrees") has been felt. It was at first intended to make Washington, D.C., the official residence of the Institution, but it was found that this would in some manner interfere with franchises which had already been granted to the "National Conservatory of Music," and New York was finally fixed upon as the most available place for incorporation. Within a year past the College of Musicians has become incorporated as a part of the University of New York, under the powers granted to the State Board of Regents of the University. This is an important step, as it secures to the certificates of the college an authority which, while it may not be altogether convincing, is certainly of more weight than they possessed before. As a matter of fact, however, the faculty of the college is made up of able professional men, and the examinations are conducted with thoroughness. Three certificates are awarded to successful candidates—"Associate," "Fellow," and "Master." The Fellow's and Master's certificates are awarded upon conditions about equivalent to those of the bachelor's and doctor's degrees of Oxford or Cambridge. The Associate certificate is based on a much simpler examination, which includes elementary harmony in four parts, modulation, two-part counterpoint, terminology, some history, acoustics, and form. There are also demonstrative examinations on the various instruments played by candidates. So far, there has not been as much interest as there should have been in obtaining the certificates of the Institution. The number of successful candidates each year has ranged between six and thirteen, while up to 1894 only fifteen persons in all had obtained the Fellowship degree, and as yet no one has succeeded in obtaining the certificate of Master of Music. It is to be hoped that the amalgamation of this Institution with one which has a fixed seat and an established place in academic affairs will give it a prestige which it certainly deserves. In the absence of regular courses of musical instruction in our colleges the matter of professional attainment has been in a most chaotic state, and to the college of American musicians must be attributed one of the earliest and one of the most conscientious efforts to draw a line of demarcation between the competent craftsman and the bungling 'prentice hand.

At the moment of writing word comes from Boston that Mr. Carl Zerrahn has resigned the conductorship of the Handel and Haydn Society, and that Mr. B. J. Lang has been appointed in his stead. The reasons for Mr. Zerrahn's retirement are not given, but the weight of advancing years may well have been the cause of his giving up the post which he has so long filled with distinguished ability. Mr. Lang's reputation has been won in the field of performance and instruction, but there is reason to expect that the wisdom of the Society's choice will be verified.

In New York lovers of sacred music are exercised over the report that the Church Choral Society is likely to disband. This organisation is only a few years old, and from its birth it has been under the bâton of Mr. Richard Henry Warren, organist of St. Bartholomew's Church. Its public performances have always been entitled "services," and have been given in four of the largest church buildings in the city—St. George's, Zion, St. Bartholomew's, and the Church of the Holy Trinity. The choirs of St. Bartholomew's and All Souls' (both of which were formerly under Mr. Warren's direction), and that of St. Thomas's Church, where Mr. Warren's father, Mr. George William Warren, is organist, have formed the nucleus of the Society, which has usually turned out a chorus of about 140 voices. The orchestras have been the best that money could provide, and all work has been done in a thoroughly painstaking and artistic way; besides which Mr. Warren's enterprise has always favoured the production of new compositions, several of which, by American musicians, have been first heard through the medium of the "Church Choral." The Society was in financial difficulties last year and an urgent appeal was made for subscribing members. The response to this enabled it to complete its season's work, but the prospects for its continuance for another year are very doubtful, though it is the most deserving organisation of the kind in the city.

The Musical Protective Union took an unusual step a few days ago when it presented a request to the municipal authorities of New York that the military bands from the New York Catholic Protectory and the Hebrew Orphan Asylum should be debarred from playing at the open-air Concerts which are given in the public parks at the city's expense. Each of these Institutions employs a good band-master, who instructs the boys who are inmates, and the bands play light music very creditably, and earn considerable money in the course of a year, sometimes obtaining engagements which require them to travel long distances. Heretofore they have been employed by the city for some of the park Concerts, but the Union objects on the ground that its members are thus prevented by cheap competition from securing employment which rightfully belongs to them. The matter is under consideration.

THE MUSICAL TIMES published last month an obituary notice of Jean Bott, violinist, who recently died in New York. Mr. Bott's death was hastened by grief and anxiety over the loss of his Stradivarius violin. He was the owner of a "Strad." which had once been the property of the Duke of Cambridge. The old musician was somewhat cramped for means in his latter days, and when Signor Nicolini, the husband of Madame Patti, appeared as a purchaser for his instrument he agreed to part with it for 4,500 dollars. The transfer was to take place on the morning of Signor Nicolini's departure for Europe. Mr. Bott was on hand with the violin, but refused to accept a certified cheque in payment, and as the purchaser did not have the gold, he was obliged to leave for the steamer without the instrument. He left word with an instrument dealer, however, to complete the purchase and send him the violin. A few days after, during the absence from home of Mr. Bott, a stranger called at his house and asked permission to await his return. He was shown to Mr. Bott's room and left there. He stole the violin and disappeared. Mr. Bott was in despair, and for weeks haunted police headquarters and district attorney's offices in the vain hope of recovering his violin. The disappointment and anxiety of waiting killed him. A few days ago the dealer who was entrusted with the negotiations was arrested with a violin in his possession which is claimed to be the missing one. The whole case turns upon the matter of identification, but so far the wife of the dead violinist has succeeded in making out a very strong case against the instrument dealer. Only the preliminary examinations have thus far been held, but when the case comes up for trial it bids fair to become, in its way, a cause célèbre.

THE sixth annual meeting of the Associated Board of the Royal Academy of Music and Royal College of Music was held, on the 8th ult., at Marlborough House, the Prince of Wales (the President) in the chair. His Royal Highness moved the adoption of the report, and Mr. Thomas Threlfall seconded the resolution, which was unanimously agreed to. Sir A. C. Mackenzie (Principal of the Royal Academy of Music) proposed, and Dr. C. H. Parry (Director of the Royal College of Music) seconded, a vote of thanks to the Prince of Wales for presiding, and for the powerful assistance and great encouragement given by His Royal Highness to the Board. The annual dinner of the Associated Board was held the same evening at the Whitehall Rooms of the Hôtel Métropole. Lord Charles Bruce, Chairman of the Board, presided, in the unavoidable absence of the Marquis of Lorne. The certificates for the London and Croydon centres of the Board were distributed by Her Royal Highness Princess Beatrice, at the Royal College of Music, on the 16th ult.

THE students of the London Organ School gave an interesting Organ and Orchestral Concert at Queen's Hall, on the 3rd ult., under the direction of Dr. G. J. Bennett. The efficiency of the training at the Institution was satisfactorily demonstrated by a number of pupils, the most notable efforts being Saint-Saëns's Andante and Rondo Capriccioso for violin, played by Mr. Isidore Schwiller, and Hiller's Pianoforte Concerto in F sharp minor, by Miss Leila Smith; while the orchestra was heard to excellent effect in a selection from Rubinstein's "Bal Costumé" and the Overture to Professor Stanford's "Canterbury Pilgrims." An organ solo—the Allegro from Widor's Sixth Symphony—by Miss Edroff, a professor at the school, also deserves mention. On the 11th ult. an extremely interesting display by the elocution students of the school, consisting of a selection from the "Midsummer Night's Dream," was given in the Concert-room of the Institution, under the direction of Mr. Charles Fry. Most of the students exhibited much refinement of style and intelligence in the rendering of their parts—some of the performers displaying special dramatic ability. The greater part of Mendelssohn's music was given by students of the school, the choir being under the direction of Mr. Walter Mackway.

A CONCERT by 5,000 voices was the principal feature in the programme at the annual Festival of the Church Sunday School Choir, which took place on the 20th ult., at the Crystal Palace. About a hundred schools from London and the suburbs were represented on the Handel Orchestra, and the general performance showed a decided advance in readiness, precision, and spirit upon preceding gatherings. The selection was not of an ambitious description, but the principal points of each piece had been mastered, so that there was never a doubt respecting the issue. Gauntlett's arrangement of "O worship the King" (given partly in unison and partly in harmony), Ernest C. Winchester's Magnificat, Henry Smart's anthem "The Lord setteth fast the mountains," and W. T. Deane's anthem "My beloved spake," were sung with a precision and well-controlled emphasis that merited hearty approval. The second part was, as usual, of a lighter kind, and included imitative effects, which seemed to please the listeners quite as much as the more youthful of the executants. The conductors were Messrs. George Hare and H. A. McLaren, and Mr. F. W. Belchamber was the organist.

WE note with satisfaction the re-opening, on the 15th ult., of the "German Reed" entertainment at St. George's Hall. Refined wit and genial humour are ever welcome, and Mr. Henry Reed, under whose management the enterprise has made a fresh start, seems to have determined that those features which have so long distinguished the "German Reed" Company should still be prominent. Mr. Rutland Barrington, with the vivacious assistance of Miss Elsie Cross, in a diverting duologue, entitled "The Professor," successfully fills the place of the late Corney Grain, and much that is provocative of laughter is contained in "The Usual Remedy," by Mr. Chance Newton, and Mr. W. S. Gilbert's operetta, "Happy Arcadia." The latter work was originally produced by Mr. and Mrs. German Reed in 1872, at the Gallery of Illustration, and has the advantage of having been set to music by Frederick Clay in his best manner. The quaint conceit is thoroughly Gilbertian in conception and treatment, and its principal characters are effectively embodied by Miss Maria Garcia, Miss Fanny Holland, Mr. Charles Wibrow, and Mr. Rutland Barrington.

THE Misses Suto, two American ladies who have studied at Berlin, and who make a specialty of duets for two pianofortes, gave a Recital, on the 8th ult., at St. James's Hall. They play so admirably and with such wonderful unanimity of expression that we hope they will not be discouraged, by the comparatively small audience which assembled, from repeating their performances at a more favourable time. We would suggest also that these clever ladies should include duets for one pianoforte in their repertory. Their programme included Bach's Concerto in C (No. 2) and pieces by Mozart, Chopin, Brahms, Liszt, and other composers. The pleasure given by the interpretations of these pieces was so warmly recognised by an audience which, though small, was exceptionally critical, that we feel sure the Misses Suto's talents have only to become more widely known in order to command a very large measure of popular recognition.

So many eminent artists had promised assistance at the Concert given on the 10th ult., at Queen's Hall, in aid of the funds of the National Society of French Teachers in England, that had the entire programme been carried out the same thing would probably have happened to the remaining members of the audience. As it was, the curtailed edition, which began at 2.30, was still going on when we left at 5.45. Among the artists who appeared may be named Miss Esther Palliser, Madame Elena Sanz (who sings with great dramatic perception), Madame Thénard, Madame Jane May, Mrs. C. Desvignes; Messrs. Johannes Wolff, Hollmann, Titto Mattei, F. Thomé, Aramis, and Mauguère. A new and very effective "Hymne à la Paix," composed for the occasion by M. Leon Schlesinger, was sung by Madame Adamson Laudi, M. Mauguère, and a choir, accompanied by organ and the Excelsior Orchestra.

By the kindness of the Dean, Welsh Evensong was sung for the first time on Saturday, the 13th ult., in St. George's Chapel, Windsor, by the Welsh choir and congregation of All Saints, Margaret Street. The anthem was "Bendige dyddo Arglwydd," &c. (Thomas), and Magnificat and Nunc dimittis, a setting in F by Mr. David J. Thomas, who presided at the organ, and was responsible for the musical portion of the service. The service was intoned by the Rev. E. Killin Roberts, Welsh Chaplain of All Saints', who was assisted in the reading of the lessons by the Rev. J. H. Pugh. At the conclusion of the service the blessing was pronounced by the Dean, who, together with Bishop Barry and Canons Gee and Dalton, joined in the procession. The choir of the chapel was filled, and there was a large congregation of English people in the nave.

VISCOUNTSSE CLIFDEN avowedly began her career "as a professional musician" at a Concert she organised at Stafford House, on the 2nd ult. Her abilities as a pianist were manifested in Trios by Marschner and Godard respectively, in which she had for companions Herr A. Blome (violin) and Herr Ehrhorn (violinello). She played with spirit, conscientiousness, and feeling—qualities not to be lightly regarded even in days when so many highly gifted executants are before the public. Viscountess Clifden also tastefully accompanied on the organ Mrs. Duncombe in Mendelssohn's "Oh, for the wings of a dove." M. Tivadar Nachèz gave as neatly as is his wont the Andante and Finale of Mendelssohn's Violin Concerto and Wieniawski's "Airs Russes." Miss Clara Butt, Herr Hugo Heinz, and the Meister Glee Singers also appeared.

THE fellowship diplomas gained at the fifty-fourth examination of the Royal College of Organists were distributed, on the 19th ult., by Sir Alexander Mackenzie, who expressed his satisfaction at the great improvement shown by the students. There were 117 entries, including six ladies. The following passed the examination successfully:—M. Allison, J. P. Attwater, B. Barrow, G. H. Brown, Miss C. A. Burleigh, H. W. Chuter, J. G. Cooper, V. Dearden, A. Docksey, H. Gibbon, A. G. Gosling, Miss A. H. Green, T. Haigh, W. A. Hall, H. Ham, J. W. G. Hathaway, A. L. Hirst, J. W. Jacobs, C. J. Lee, E. M. Lee, W. Maker, H. Morris, S. A. Mosdell, H. G. Moulden, G. T. Patman, J. R. Reeve, H. P. Richardson, H. S. Scott, W. E. Snow, F. E. Swan, and Miss A. Whitaker.

AN interesting Concert was given on the 8th ult., at Queen's Hall, by Mr. W. H. Wing and Mr. Walter Alcock. Mr. Wing gave a vigorous rendering of Purcell's "See, the Heavens smile," from his incidental music to "The Tempest," and also sang Mdlle. Chaminade's "Amour d'Automne" with much tender expression. Mr. Alcock joined Mr. Herbert Sharpe in Saint-Saëns's Polo-naise, and Variations by Mr. Sharpe on a Hungarian air, and he played the accompaniments throughout the Concert in most careful and musicianly style. Mr. Alcock also appeared as a composer in "The Song of the Egyptian Girl" (Miss Jessie King), a "Sonnet" (Mr. Wing), and two duets, sung by Madame Annie Marriott and Miss Jessie King. These compositions were, on the whole, very successful.

MR. JAN MULDER, the violoncellist, appeared both as composer and player at his Concert in Brinsmead's Gallery, on the 10th ult. In the latter capacity he was more successful than in the former, the Sonata in F for violoncello and pianoforte from his pen wanting the conciseness of one who has something interesting to say and is anxious to go straight to his subject. Mr. Mulder admirably executed solos by Bruch, Popper, and other composers for the violoncello, and effectively joined Messrs. Seiffert, Bobbé, and Schneider in Godard's string Quartet in G minor. In a good performance of Bach's Concerto in D minor for two violins and pianoforte, Mrs. Seiffert was associated with Messrs. Seiffert and Bobbé, and Madame Cornelia Meysenheim was among the vocalists.

A PROMINENT feature of late years in the manufacture of musical instruments is the amount of artistic skill lavished at the bidding of wealthy amateurs on exterior embellishments. Most of our great firms of pianoforte manufacturers have exhibited exceptionally beautiful examples of such instruments. Quite recently Messrs. Broadwood invited inspection of a particularly handsome pianoforte, the case of which, designed strictly in the Louis XVI. style, they have, we learn, taken no less than two years to complete. A description of the decorations of this exquisite piece of workmanship would occupy a column of our space; enough that they are worthy the reputation of the eminent firm from which it emanates, which is saying much.

THE most interesting feature of the proceedings during the Commemoration at Durham University, in June last, was the presentation of the hon. degree of D.C.L. to Sir John Stainer, who was most cordially received. Dr. Kynaston, in presenting him, referred to the great service Sir John Stainer had rendered to Church music. He did not, he said, employ Scripture merely as a basis upon which to found an academically accurate composition; he did more, he never forgot that the words he was setting to music were the words of Scripture. His anthem, "I am Alpha and Omega," might be almost called exegetic, and in the setting of Cardinal Newman's "Kindly Light" he interpreted the poet's inmost feelings.

THE existence of a highly interesting portrait of Sebastian Bach has just been brought to light, at Leipzig, in connection with the stir occasioned by the wonderful bust of the composer recently modelled over the presumably genuine skull of the great cantor by Herr Seffner. The portrait in question, which has been in the possession of the family of a Herr Borman, of Leipzig, for generations, is a pencil drawing, slightly coloured, and represents the master at middle age, the only one of this period extant. The genuineness of the portrait (which is being published in photogravure by Meissenbach, Riffert and Co., of Leipzig) has been recognised both by Herr Seffner and Professor Hiss.

THE "celestial organ" recently added to Messrs. Hill's instrument in Westminster Abbey was introduced to public notice on the 17th ult., by an interesting Organ Recital given by Dr. Bridge. The addition has been placed in the triforium of the South transept, over the tomb of Handel, and is the gift of Mr. A. D. Clarke. The new pipes were first heard in Schubert's "Moment Musical" in A flat, but they were used most effectively in Liszt's transcription of the "Ave Maria," commonly attributed to Arcadelt, and in the Prelude to "Parsifal." Organ music proper was well represented by Bach's Toccata in F, and the choristers of the Abbey provided agreeable variety.

MADAME ALVA, a soprano who seems to have given special attention to dramatic airs, to which her voice and style are eminently suited, gave a Concert at St. James's Hall on the 2nd ult. "Elizabeth's Greeting to the Hall of Song" ("Tannhäuser"), "Com é bello" ("Lucrezia Borgia"), the air in the prison scene of "Mefistofele," and duets from "Les Huguenots" and "Aida" served to prove by contrast of style and of sentiment the powers of the vocalist. Madame Alva, who was exceedingly well received, obtained artistic assistance from Mdlle. Olitzka, Miss Marie Dubois (pianist), Mr. Richard Green, and Mr. Alexander Bevan.

THROUGH good and evil report Trinity College has prospered, and a large company assembled at the Royal Institute of Painters in Water Colours when the annual Conversazione was held, on the 17th ult. A capital programme of music was provided, in which students and professors of the College took effective part. Among the principal pieces were a Russian Suite for strings by Wüerst, which was conducted by Mr. L. Szczepanowski, with violin obligato by Miss Vera Douglas; two movements from a Flute Quartet by Kuhlau, in which Mr. John Radcliff took the lead; and two movements from a Concerto for four violins, by Maurer.

A PIANOFORTE and Vocal Recital, given by Miss Stuart Smith and Madame Robiolio, at Steinway Hall, on the 11th ult., included two interesting Italian duets of the early part of the seventeenth century—one by Marco da Gagliano—cleverly sung by Madame Robiolio and Mr. Paul England. This gentleman, who was responsible for the English translation for the duets, also introduced for the first time two Sacred songs by Dvořák. Madame Robiolio's contributions especially were received with much favour, and the Concert-givers were assisted by Miss Edith Blyth and Miss Kate Lee (violin), in addition to Mr. England.

THERE was again a fashionable crowd at the last Wagner Concert, at Queen's Hall, which was conducted by Herr Mottl. It is clear that these Concerts have "come to stay"; and, as an indication of increased public interest in orchestral music of the highest class, the fact supplies reason for rejoicing. The programme consisted of the Overture to "Euryanthe," the third act of "Parsifal," and copious extracts from "Die Meistersinger," the vocal exponents of Walter, Parsifal, Gurnemanz, Amfortas, and David being respectively Messrs. Van Dyck, Plunkett Greene, Bispham, and Anton Schlosser. Mr. Van Dyck's voice has greatly deteriorated since his last visit, but otherwise the performances gave nothing but pleasure. Two further Concerts will be given in November, MM. Mottl and Levi being conductors.

THE annual Harp Concert of Mr. John Thomas took place, on the 6th ult., at St. James's Hall. There were over twenty lady harpists, and the orchestra presented an unusual and certainly pretty appearance. Mr. John Thomas is not only a gifted performer, but an able preceptor, and the efforts of himself as a soloist and of his fair pupils in ensemble were much appreciated by a large audience. His own compositions were deservedly applauded, especially a Romance for violoncello and harp, in which Mr. Thomas was associated with Mr. J. Hollman. There were several vocalists, chiefly hailing from gallant little Wales.

THE Countess of Radnor exerted herself in a good cause on June 29, by conducting a Concert in Queen's Hall in aid of the Society for the Prevention of Cruelty to Children. A string orchestra and choir, consisting entirely of ladies, gave several pieces in a highly creditable manner, wisdom being shown in the selection of instrumental works and part-songs well within the means of amateurs interested in their labours. Madame Marie Brema did justice to a "Norwegian Shepherd Song," Miss Ashton Jonson was successful in Hiller's "He in tears that soweth," and among the other able contributors were M. Bonnard and Mr. Byard.

MADAME CARAVOGGIA had no difficulty in arranging an attractive programme for her Concert on the 1st ult., in Queen's Hall, several nationalities being ably represented both vocally and instrumentally. Miss Carlotta Elliot very tastefully gave airs by Massenet and Paul Vidal, Mr. Henry Piercy sang "O vision entrancing" from "Esmeralda," Mr. Sydney Brooks played violoncello solos with his accustomed skill, Miss Edie Reynolds was heard in Sauret's "Valse Characteristique" for violin, and excellent service was also rendered by Mlle. Otto Brony, Mlle. Marie Titien, Messrs. George Aspinall, Maggi, and Winckworth.

AT the request of the director of the St. Petersburg Conservatoire, we have pleasure in reminding those amongst our readers who may be interested in the matter that the second International Competition for the Rubinstein Prize (for pianoforte playing and composition respectively) will take place, from the 20th inst., at Berlin, under conditions already indicated in these columns. The orchestral rehearsals will commence two or three days previous to the above date. Competitors will obtain all further particulars on their arrival at Berlin, by applying to the well known Concert-Agency of Herr Hermann Wolff.

THE seventeenth International Congress for the protection of literary and artistic authorship (Association Littéraire et Artistique Internationale) will take place next month at Dresden, under the protectorate of the King of Saxony. An interesting programme, including Concert performances and a gala representation at the Opera, is being provided for the meeting, which promises to be very numerously attended by delegates from all parts of Europe. Johannes Brahms, Eduard Brockhaus, and Paul Heyse are amongst the honorary presidents.

MENDELSSOHN'S "Hymn of Praise" was given at South Hackney Parish Church, on June 27, at a special service in connection with the Dedication Festival. The solo parts were well sustained by Mr. J. Müllerhausen and two of Mr. Dutton's boys, and the Symphony and accompaniments were rendered by an efficient orchestra. The excellent singing of the choruses by the choir of the church deserves special recognition. Mr. W. G. Wood ably presided at the organ, and Mr. John E. West, the organist and choirmaster of the church, conducted.

A VOCAL and Instrumental Concert was given by the pupils of the School for the Indigent Blind, under the direction of Mr. Herbert Hodge, on June 26. The programme included the chorus from "The Messiah," "Since by man came death," Mendelssohn's "Judge me, O God," Mazzinghi's "Ye shepherds, tell me," several duets for male and female voices respectively, and some organ solos. The pieces given by the band included the popular "Shepherds' Dance" from German's "Henry VIII." music.

MR. EDWARD DANNREUTHER has accepted the post of President of the Wagner Society, vacated by the Earl of Dysart. Mr. Dannreuther was the founder of the original London Wagner Society, in 1872, and he conducted many of the Concerts given under the auspices of that Association; he also directed the Wagner evenings during the series of nightly Concerts given by Messrs. Novello, at the Royal Albert Hall, in 1874. It was in Mr. Dannreuther's house that Wagner resided during his visit to London in 1877.

AT the recent competition in connection with the International Music Trades' Exhibition, held at the Agricultural Hall, the first prize (a pianoforte of the value of 125 guineas) for soprano vocalists was won by Miss Annie Swinfen, until recently a student of the Guildhall School of Music; and the first prize (a pianoforte of the value of 110 guineas) for tenors was won by Mr. Lloyd Chandos, a present student of the same Institution.

THE first annual Meeting of the Church Orchestral Society was held at Rayleigh House, Chelsea, on the 3rd ult., and the Report presented showed that the past year has been spent chiefly in organisation; but it is hoped that at no distant date the Society may render valuable aid in what is becoming an important branch of church work. Mr. Prendergast has resigned the conductorship and has been succeeded by Dr. G. J. Bennett.

THE Dedication Service at St. Mary's, Brookfield, Dartmouth Park, was held on the 7th ult. The service was the setting by Smart in F, and Dr. J. M. Ennis's Psalm—"God is our hope and strength"—took the place of the anthem. In addition to the organ accompaniment (played by Mr. Herbert Try), trumpets and trombones were employed. Dr. J. M. Ennis, the organist and choirmaster of the church, conducted.

A FUND has been formed for the assistance of the widow and family of the late Mr. W. C. Levey, the composer, who was for many years Musical Director of the Theatre Royal, Drury Lane, and other London theatres. He died last year, leaving his wife and five children wholly unprovided for. Donations may be sent to Mr. H. H. Levey, 7, Haycroft Road, Brixton Hill; or to Mr. W. H. Cummings, Sydgate, West Dulwich.

MADAME EDMOND LAURENS, a young French pianist, gave a Pianoforte Recital, on the 11th ult., in the Salle Erard, which afforded manifest enjoyment to a numerous audience. Madame Laurens plays with intelligence, delicacy, and, when necessary, with considerable power; and will be heard again with pleasure. French recitations were given, with much acceptance, by Madame Rejane.

THREE special performances are announced to take place at the Hampstead Conservatoire in the autumn, consisting of Recitals by Mr. and Mrs. Henschel, and Señor Sarasate; and a representation of "Antigone" (with Mendelssohn's music), directed by Mr. Charles Fry, on a stage specially erected in accordance with the traditions of the Greek drama.

THE organisers of the Benefit Concert to Dr. F. J. Sawyer, which is now arranged to take place at the Dome, Brighton, on November 2, are specially fortunate in promises of the presence of Sir A. C. Mackenzie, Dr. Hubert Parry, Professor Stanford, and Professor Bridge to conduct their own compositions—a notable gathering of native composers.

AN Organ Recital was given at St. Mary's, Greenwich Park, on Sunday, the 21st ult., by Mr. R. W. Browne. The programme included Handel's Organ Concerto in F (No. 4) and movements from Mozart's Eleventh Symphony and Widor's Organ Symphony in D. Mr. E. T. Walford was the vocalist.

MADAME CELLINI gave her annual Concert, at St. James's Hall, on the 11th ult., when two of her pupils, Miss Lilian Terry and Miss Marsh, sang with acceptance. Other artists were Madame Iago, Señor Guetary, Signor Aramis, and Mr. Charles Magrath.

A "BRITISH" Musical Biography, by James D. Brown, Librarian to the Clerkenwell Public Library, and Stephen S. Stratton, the well known Birmingham musical critic, is in course of publication and promises to be of exceptional interest.

The interesting series of papers contributed by the late Mr. Carrodus to The Strad, under the heading "Chats to Violin Students," will shortly be issued in book form.

MR. WILLEM COENEN has been appointed Professor of the Pianoforte at the Guildhall School of Music, in place of Mr. E. Pauer, who has resigned.

MR. GILBERT H. BETJEMANN has been appointed leader of the orchestra at the Royal Italian Opera, in succession to the late Mr. Carrodus.

OBITUARY.

THE career of a truly distinguished and conscientious musician has come to a premature close, and his place, at the head of our principal orchestras, so long worthily occupied, knows him no more. JOHN TIPLADY CARRODUS, the representative English violinist, passed away suddenly on the morning of the 13th ult., within a few hours after fulfilling his usual duties at the Covent Garden Opera. He was in his sixtieth year, and still in the prime possession of his artistic faculties and energies. His life was not an eventful one; it was essentially that of the unostentatious worker and teacher. Yet it was a fortunate thing for English art, and probably also for himself, that the "infant prodigy"—in which character the boy of nine made his début in his native Keighley, and four years later "created an immense sensation" by playing a Fantasia by Vieuxtemps at one of the veteran Salaman's concerts—did not develop, as he might easily have done, into the mere virtuoso, of whom the world has enough and to spare. For though in after-years a brilliant solo-player, commanding the respect of his brother violinists by his faultless interpretation of the music of Bach, Carrodus possessed in a special degree those gifts which go to the making of a perfect orchestral leader: conscientiousness in interpretation, firmness in leading, ready resource in emergencies. These qualities Sir Michael Costa soon recognised in the young musician, who, after a course of study under Moliqne, at Stuttgart, came to him warmly recommended by his late master and by Spohr, and who thereupon, in 1855, was engaged to play at the Bradford Festival. Since then—that is, for the last forty years—Carrodus has been permanently associated with the best English orchestras, succeeding Sainton, on the latter's resignation in 1869, in the leadership of that of Covent Garden—a position which he subsequently also assumed at the Philharmonic Concerts and at all the great provincial festivals, with the exception only of that of Birmingham. It was only in February last that the freedom of Keighley was presented to him in commemoration of the fiftieth anniversary of his first public appearance there. His career, uneventful, as we have said, in outward circumstance, was thus replete with artistic activity of a high order. Add to this the laborious occupation of a much-sought teacher, under whose sympathetic and indefatigable care numberless pupils have been formed, and it will be gratefully conceded that the sum total of his life's work is a substantial one. That such is the general feeling has, amongst other demonstrations of public sympathy, been gracefully signalled by the fact that, when the earthly remains were laid at rest, "the wreaths sent by friends were so many that a second hearse had to be used for their conveyance to the cemetery." Ephemeral though be the career of the reproductive artist, the artistic individuality of him we have just lost will survive in the influence of his teaching; while his name will be honourably perpetuated in the profession by a number of sons, who inherit a fair share of the father's ability and faithful devotion to his art.

The sudden death of Mr. WILLIAM SMYTH ROCKSTRO, on the 2nd ult., has removed perhaps the most eminent of English musical antiquaries. He did not take up this branch of the art, however, except as a student, until comparatively late in life. Born in the twenties, he studied at the Leipzig Conservatorium, being contemporary as a student there with Joachim and Otto Goldschmidt. He was a pupil of Mendelssohn, Plaidy, and Hauptmann, and on his return to London he won a considerable position as a pianist and more especially as an accompanist. In his early life he contributed largely to that class of compositions for the pianoforte which were then in vogue, and wrote many operatic fantasias and drawing-room pieces of all kinds. His songs represent the higher side of the work of this period, and such charming works as "Queen and Huntress, chaste and fair," or "A jewel for my lady's ear" have a value of their own, even in a day when all the conditions of music are widely different from what they were. He lived for many years at Torquay, which he quitted only a few years ago, after an honourable career as teacher of singing and pianoforte, in both which capacities, strange to say, he was remarkably successful. His studies in the theory of music and the older developments of the art, prosecuted during this part of his life, bore fruit at first in his contributions to Grove's Dictionary, many of which are absolutely indispensable to the student of old music. In all that belonged to ecclesiastical music, and the influence of the modes upon the compositions of the fifteenth and sixteenth centuries, he was an authority without rival in England, and during the last years of his life his valuable instructions in musical archaeology were greatly appreciated both at the Royal College of Music and elsewhere. In point of value, his position as a historian of music was secondary to that which he occupied as a theorist and an interpreter of the older theorists. In the former class, his "Life of Handel"—of whom he was a passionate admirer—his "History of Music," and the biography of "Jenny Lind, the Artist"—written in collaboration with Canon Scott Holland—are his most important works. The "History" contains a typical instance of his open-mindedness and fearless candour, in the retraction of certain views antagonistic to Wagner's art, which he had expressed in one of his most important articles in the Dictionary. Apart from the Dictionary, his theoretical writings were sadly few; a set of manuals on harmony, counterpoint, &c., were published by Messrs. R. Cocks and Co., and a primer on "Just Intonation" for Messrs. Novello's series was nearly completed at the time of his death. His most important composition was an Oratorio, "The Good Shepherd," brought out at the Gloucester Festival of 1886, which made no great impression owing to its quiet devotional character. To Rockstro belongs the credit of having edited, in a series entitled "The Standard Lyric Drama," the first pianoforte scores of operas at a moderate price, which were provided with useful indications of the disposition of instruments in the accompaniments, &c.

MR. THOMAS RIDLEY PRENTICE, a highly esteemed teacher of the pianoforte and able author on the technique of his instrument, died, on the 15th ult., at his residence in Hampstead, aged fifty-three. The deceased, who in a rare degree combined the instincts of the true artist with a capacity to communicate to others his technical knowledge and lofty ideals of his art, was born at Ongar, in 1842, and at the age of nineteen he entered the Royal Academy of Music, where he succeeded in obtaining the Cipriani Potter Exhibition. Although an excellent solo pianist, who performed, inter alia, Beethoven's Rondo in B flat at the Crystal Palace, for the first time in England, Mr. Prentice devoted himself to teaching almost from the beginning of his career and with most happy results. Nor should his efforts to popularise high-class music be ignored, which led to the foundation of the Monthly Popular Concerts at Brixton, and the institution of the cheap Concerts for the working classes at Kensington Town Hall. Amongst his numerous compositions, many of them only arrangements for his instrument, may be mentioned a cantata, "Linda," for female voices; while his technical writings include a series of valuable instruction books entitled "The Musician," as well as a treatise on "Hand Gymnastics" (one of Novello's Primers), all of which are justly esteemed in the profession. Mr. Prentice had been a Professor at the Guildhall School of Music since its foundation.

The death is announced, on the 9th ult., at Puy, near Dieppe, of Madame MIOLAN-CARVALHO, the famous French prima donna, one of the foremost lyrical artists of the century. Born at Marseilles on December 31, 1831, she entered the Conservatoire when she was twelve years old. At the end of four years she gained the first prize, and in 1850 made her début at the Opera Comique in the "Ambasadrice," and rapidly became popular. Three years later she married M. Carvalho, and in 1854 accompanied him to the Théâtre Lyrique, to the management of which he had been appointed, and obtained an immense success in the "Fanchonnette," after which she became an established favourite with the French public. An exquisite actress and faultless vocalist, Madame Carvalho's most brilliant successes on the stage were in connection with Gounod's works; the composer of "Faust" and of "Roméo et Juliette" recognising in her, according to his own expression, not merely an interpreter, but a collaborator, the ultimate success of "Faust," after its original failure, being, in fact, largely due to her splendid assumption of the rôle of Marguerite. Madame Carvalho made her début in London in 1839, at Covent Garden, on the production of Meyerbeer's "Dinorah," and she was a leading member of the elder Gye's company until 1864. In 1875 Madame Carvalho appeared at the Paris Opéra, where, in addition to "Faust," she appeared in M. Ambroise Thomas's "Hamlet" and in the "Huguenots." Ten years later she bade farewell to the stage and devoted herself exclusively to teaching. There was a large concourse of musical artists at the service held in memory of the deceased lady in the Church of St. Augustine, Paris, when excerpts from the Requiem music by Mozart, Gounod, and Saint-Saëns were played on the organ by M. Gigout.

We regret to record the death of Mr. HENRY A. LAMBETH, which took place, after a very short illness, at Glasgow, on June 27. Mr. Lambeth, who was born in Portsmouth in 1819, was the Glasgow City Organist, a post which he held for many years and to the entire satisfaction of the community. He was the favourite pupil of the late Henry Smart, on whose recommendation, by the way, he received the appointment just referred to. In 1857 Mr. Lambeth succeeded Mr. Julius Seligmann as Conductor of the Glasgow Choral Union, and held that important position for over twenty years. Mr. Lambeth was also Organist at Park Parish Church for a long period, and many musical folk will not readily forget the truly devotional feeling with which the services in Glasgow's well known West End Church were invariably associated. The deceased musician was a man of kindly disposition and had many friends not only in England, but throughout the "Land o' Cakes" itself, where his Balmoral Choir was, indeed, a household word. It is, then, not surprising to know that a movement is on foot to perpetuate the memory of a truly lovable man.

Musical art in Holland has sustained a severe loss in the death, on June 30, at Utrecht, of M. Y. C. M. VAN RIEMSDIJK, one of the technical directors of State Railways, aged fifty-two. The scion of an aristocratic family occupying an influential position, and himself a musical amateur of considerable attainments, the deceased was for a number of years an enthusiastic and intelligent promoter of the art in his native country. His house at Utrecht was open to all connected with the profession, he was the leading spirit of the Society for the Encouragement of Musical Art in the town, and the founder and conductor of an excellent a capella choir in connection with that Institution. A man of culture and of erudition in matters concerning the history of music, Van Riemsdijk also worthily occupied, for some years past, the chair of the Society for "Noord Nederlandsche Muziek-Geschiednis." Altogether, he was a personality which will not be easily replaced.

The death is announced, on the 1st ult., at Paris, of M. CHARLES RÉTY, for the last twenty-four years the distinguished musical critic of Le Figaro, signing his articles with the pseudonym of "Charles Darcours." Before adopting journalism as a profession, M. Réty had been for some seasons director of the old Théâtre Lyrique, where he brought out M. Ernest Rey's "La Statue," his régime being otherwise distinguished by truly artistic aims. In his capacity of critic, the deceased brought to bear an excellent musical training, his articles being, moreover, invariably characterised by moderation in the expression of his own somewhat conservative views, and by a delicate consideration for the opinions of others. He was in his seventieth year.

In Signor ALESSANDRO BUSI, whose death, at the age of sixty-one, is announced at Bologna, Italy has lost a musician of sterling qualities and a highly successful teacher of his art. A native of Bologna, he received his first musical instruction from his father, Giovanni Busi, himself an artist of note; and at an early period entered the orchestra of the Teatro Comunale as violoncellist. He subsequently rose to the position of conductor at that Institution, and in 1865 was appointed to a professorship at the Liceo, where he taught harmony and counterpoint with conspicuous success. Busi's sphere of activity became, however, considerably enlarged by his assuming, in 1884, the directorship of a Vocal School, which in a short time attained a great reputation, attracting pupils from all parts of Italy and elsewhere, and from which not a few singers of distinction have issued, amongst others Mesdames Giovannoni-Zachi, Musiani, and Meyer, MM. Bartolomasi and Borghi. The deceased was the composer of a Requiem, several masses, a symphony entitled "Excelsior," for chorus and orchestra, and of numerous pianoforte pieces and songs.

Many will regret the death of Mr. W. HODGE, Assistant-Organist at St. Paul's Cathedral, Organist of Marylebone Parish Church and to the Royal Albert Hall Choral Society, which occurred on the 15th ult. Mr. Hodge was born in 1862, and early showed musical abilities. At the suggestion of Sir John Stainer, he competed for and obtained a Scholarship at the newly-established National Training School for Music, and his subsequent career fully justified his adoption of music as a profession. His mastery of the organ and excellent judgment was perhaps best shown by his management of the colossal instrument at the Albert Hall during the performances of the Royal Choral Society, and his capabilities as a Church musician were strikingly shown at St. Paul's Cathedral and at his own church. Above all, he discharged the higher duties of life in a manner that caused him to be held in the highest esteem by all with whom he worked.

FRIEDRICH LUX, for many years the highly esteemed orchestral conductor of the Stadt-Theater in Mayence, where he also conducted several choral societies, died at that town on the 9th ult. Born November 20, 1820, at Ruhla (Thuringia), he studied music under Schneider at Dessau, and began his professional career as musical director at the Hof-Theater there. He was also an excellent organist and a composer of merit for that instrument, as well as of several masses and of the successful operas "Der Schmied von Ruhla" and "Käthchen von Heilbronn." He was an amiable and modest artist, who in his time exercised a considerable influence upon the musical life of Mayence.

We have also to record the following deaths:

On June 12, at Aumühle, near Friedrichsruhe, W. HAGEN, popular operatic singer at different German theatres, aged seventy-seven.

On June 14, at St. Louis, Mo. (United States), JOSEPH LUBELEY, the highly-esteemed conductor of the "St. Liborius" Male Choral Society, and zealous promoter of Catholic church music in that town.

On June 17, at Berlin, HERMANN BUCHHOLZ, director of the Training College for military band conductors.

On June 16, at Hanover, JOSEF BLETZACHER, for many years an excellent basso at the Hof-Theater, and successful teacher, in his sixtieth year.

Recently, at Heidelberg, FRAU ELISABETH HAASE-CAPITAIN, once a popular prima donna of the Frankfort Stadt-Theater and other theatres, aged seventy-seven.

On June 22, at Hastings, aged fifty-six, Mr. J. A. BIRCH, formerly a chorister at Canterbury Cathedral, and subsequently at Westminster Abbey, and a gentleman of the Chapels Royal. He was an excellent singer, his voice being well trained and admirably under control. To a large section of the public he was known as a choir-trainer of exceptional capacity.

On the 1st ult., at Copenhagen, PETER SCHRAMM, for many years member of the Royal Theatre, who, six years ago, on the occasion of his seventieth birthday, once more appeared in his favourite part of Leporello; aged seventy-six.

On the 2nd ult., at West Norwood, ROBERT SLOMAN, Mus. Doc., Oxon., aged sixty-five.

Recently, at Versailles, EUGÈNE ABBEY, one of the chiefs of the firm of E. and J. Abbey, and son of John Abbey, who, about 1830, established at Versailles the organ factory to which he has given his name.

Recently, at Baden, near Vienna, WILHELM KRANKENHAGEN, celebrated bassoon player, formerly professor at the St. Petersburg Conservatoire; since 1869 member of the Imperial Viennese orchestra, and professor at the Conservatorium; aged seventy.

On June 9, at San Francisco, CHARLES GOFFRIE, violinist. Born at Mannheim, he came to England in 1842, and was engaged at the Royal Italian Opera, Covent Garden, from 1847 until 1872. He also played at the Philharmonic, Ella's Musical Union, &c., and was a member of Her Majesty's private band.

CORRESPONDENCE.

THE "INVENTION" OF POLYPHONY.

TO THE EDITOR OF "THE MUSICAL TIMES."

SIR,—Apropos of your remarks on Mr. Davey's theory that Dunstable "invented polyphony," I note that in the article to which you refer in your June number Mr. Davey cites, as his chief modern authority, Dr. F. X. Haberl, Musical Director at Ratisbon Cathedral, from whose article on Du Fay, published in the Vierteljahrsschrift (first year), he quotes a passage which certainly shows that, when he wrote it, Dr. Haberl accepted the statement in question. But Dr. Haberl wrote this in 1885, and as Mr. Davey is careful to point this out, he is evidently not aware that the same eminent savant wrote something quite different five years later—by which time he had evidently discovered that his former view was an error. If Mr. Davey will refer to the ninth edition of Dr. Haberl's "Magister Choralis," published in 1890, he will find the following on page 2: "From the thirteenth to the fifteenth centuries arose Polyphony (Vom 13. bis 15. Jahrhundert entstand die Polyphonie), which in the fifteenth century, through Wilkam du Fay (ob. 1474 in Cambrai) and his pupils, was still further perfected in its rhythmical aspect."—Truly yours,

F. GILBERT WEBB.

July, 1895.

[We are obliged by Mr. Webb's quotation from Dr. Haberl's "Magister Choralis," which, when writing, we had overlooked. It will be seen from our article in another column, however, that Polyphony "arose" quite a couple of centuries earlier than is admitted even in Dr. Haberl's last statement.—ED., M.T.]

MR. CORDER'S LECTURES.

TO THE EDITOR OF "THE MUSICAL TIMES."

SIR,—While thanking you for your kind remarks on my lectures, you will allow me to join issue with you on one or two small points. You say, "That which is born of calculation differs widely from that which the brain produces by unconscious effort." Are you sure of that? It is a common belief that brilliant achievements are the result of "unconscious cerebration"; but that this is always the case I can bring shoals of instances to disprove. Unconscious cerebration is a very convenient thing, but I cannot myself regard it as superior to conscious labour of mind. That were too humiliating a notion.

Next, as to the "something" which gives "life" to an art work. Until it can be made clear to me what kind of a "something" this is, I must be excused for retaining the logical belief that art works only differ in degree of merit, not in essence at all. You urge the young musician to strive to give this "something" due expression when it cries for birth, but how can he if it is impalpable and indescribable? This surely amounts to no more than saying, "Be very self-critical."

Again, you ask how is it that in some works the themes are inappropriate to their treatment? This sentence should be, "How is it that in some works the treatment is inappropriate to the themes?"—for I presume that you must have your themes before you can treat them. The answer is then obvious that, if the composer fails to select a suitable method of treating his subjects, he fails to produce a satisfactory art work. Remember that I did not say melody had no character of its own, but a melodic phrase, which is quite a different thing. Whether the phrase skips or goes by step matters not one jot until it is built up into form, as I showed by some rather striking examples. It is not a question of suggestiveness, but of definite character—again, two very different things.

But these are all side issues; the whole argument pervading my lectures was one which I conceive you will hardly dispute (though my audience refused to accept it)—namely, that Art is a human fabrication, and that therefore it can be learnt and cultivated by all human beings (though of course in widely different degrees). The amateur cannot conceive of anything being learnt; though, strange to say, he believes in teaching! To him things "come," or do not "come"—generally the latter, one must confess. My appeal—my vain and hopeless appeal—was for him (it is chiefly her though) to put more faith in human intelligence and less in Divine interference. I said, and I repeat, that it is sheer insult to regard the person whose whole being is devoted to absorbing and reproducing the manifold mysteries of art as a kind of pump of which he works the handle while the Almighty supplies the water.—Faithfully yours,

F. CORDER.

WIND INSTRUMENTS.

TO THE EDITOR OF "THE MUSICAL TIMES"

SIR,—A letter appeared in the June number of your paper, signed by Ed. Sachs, in which he cites a sarcastic reply, said to have been made by Haydn to a certain horn player, as showing "the views of composers, and consequently also of the general public, with regard to compositions for and performances by wind instruments."

It would no doubt be a very desirable state of affairs if, as Mr. Sachs says is the case, the views of the general public in musical matters agreed with those of the great composers; but I am afraid this musical millennium has not yet been reached—even in Manchester.

It appears that the remarks attributed to Haydn were made to a particular horn player, most probably an amateur—in Haydn's time a poor professional player was not very likely to be able to engage the services of a master to compose music specially for him—and were not made of wind instrumentalists or even of horn players in general; and that this was not Haydn's opinion is abundantly proved in his symphonies and other orchestral works, where many of the leading themes and finest ideas are given to the oboe, horn, or bassoon.

When, however, we consider the primitive and faulty construction of the wind instruments at the disposal of Haydn and the older composers, the only wonder is that they employed them so largely, and it must have been solely due to the feeling that, without their relief orchestral works would be comparatively flat and colourless, that they used them at all. How Haydn would have scored, had he had the improved instruments and admirable players of the present day at his disposal, can only be surmised.

Neither is what Mr. Sachs states to be the public feeling with regard to wind instrument music borne out by facts. The most cultured and critical audience in England, or perhaps in the world, is that which attends the Monday and Saturday "Pops." at St. James's Hall, and I have invariably found, and I think most old frequenters will agree with me, that whenever Beethoven's Septet, Schubert's Octet, Mozart's Clarinet Quintet, or other works for wind instruments were on the programme, there was sure to be an extra good house.

That wind instruments were "particularly in favour" in Haydn's time as compared with the present day, is also directly contrary to facts, as anyone with even a slight acquaintance with the orchestral works of the great composers knows—in fact, they have been steadily more and more largely employed up to modern times, and certainly have not yet reached their highest development either in orchestral or chamber music.

Of course I am fully aware that the string instruments are, and will always be, the life and soul of the orchestra; but as a player and lover of wind instrument music I could not let Mr. Sachs's letter pass without a word of protest.—Truly yours,

CORNIO.

Montreal, Canada, July 5, 1895.

MANX MUSIC.

TO THE EDITOR OF "THE MUSICAL TIMES."

SIR,—In your comments upon my paper on the above subject at a recent meeting of the Musical Association you protest against my proposal to "restore" one of the tunes published in 1820 in "Mona Melodies"—a book, be it known, which is full of obvious mistakes. Will you allow me to state exactly the nature and extent of my vandalism?

The melody in question is a dance tune and, as there given, runs (or rather limps) as follows:

Now I think that all unprejudiced musicians will agree with me that the second section of the tune is minus two bars, and that the proposed "restoration" of it in my forthcoming Collection of Manx National Airs is a legitimate one. Here it is:

Yours faithfully,

Sidcup, Kent.

W. H. GILL.

[We shall be glad if a few "unprejudiced musicians" will favour us with opinions on the value of Mr. Gill's "restoration." We naturally reserve our own comments.—ED., M.T.]

EXAMINATIONS AT THE ROYAL ACADEMY OF MUSIC.

TO THE EDITOR OF "THE MUSICAL TIMES."

SIR,—I have before me the syllabus of the forthcoming examination of the Royal Academy of Music, in which I observe that the Board of Examiners for pianoforte students comprises the same names as were announced in last year's syllabus.

I should be glad if you would allow me a few lines of your valuable space to express my dissatisfaction, and that of many others, with the arrangements made by the Royal Academy of Music at the last examination, whereby an additional Board was constituted, and candidates were examined by different Boards.

It is true that the Royal Academy of Music reserves to itself the right of so doing, but at the same time I scarcely think it fair that candidates at the same examination should be judged by two different standards, which is sure to be the case in such a matter as pianoforte-playing, where individual peculiarities must affect the opinions and judgment of different men.

The difficulty could be met by holding the examination twice, instead of only once a year, as at present.—Thanking you in anticipation, I am, yours faithfully,

July 4, 1895.

UNZUFRIEDEN.

[There is every reason to believe that the contemporary examination of pianoforte students by two Boards is quite satisfactory. It has, at any rate, proved so for a number of years, and the Examiners are fully in accord as to the standard to be required. There are no doubt difficulties in the way of holding examinations twice a year which perhaps our correspondent may not see, but which may be sufficient to prevent the Royal Academy from altering its arrangements.—ED., M.T.]

TO CORRESPONDENTS.

* * Notices of concerts, of which programmes must invariably be sent, and other information supplied by our friends in the country, must be forwarded as early as possible after the occurrence; otherwise they cannot be inserted.

Our correspondents will oblige by writing all names as clearly as possible, as we cannot be responsible for any mistakes that may occur.

Correspondents are informed that their names and addresses must accompany all communications.

We cannot undertake to return offered contributions; the authors, therefore, will do well to retain copies.

Notice is sent to all subscribers whose payment (in advance) is exhausted. The paper will be discontinued where the Subscription is not renewed. We again remind those who are disappointed in obtaining back numbers that, although the music is always kept in stock, only a sufficient quantity of the rest of the paper is printed to supply the current sale.

BRIEF SUMMARY OF COUNTRY NEWS.

We do not hold ourselves responsible for any opinions expressed in this summary, as all the notices are either collated from the local papers or supplied to us by correspondents.

AYLESBURY.—The Vale of Aylesbury Sacred Harmonic Society gave its second summer Concert in the Manor House grounds, on the 4th ult. The principal feature of the programme was Offenbach's comic opera "Forty Winks," in which the principal parts were taken by Miss A. Walker, Mr. V. H. Jarvis, and Mr. W. Burt. Glees were sung by the choir and songs by individual members of the Society. The Orchestral Society gave valuable assistance, and Mr. R. S. C. Keymer conducted.

BLAINA, MONMOUTHSHIRE.—The English Congregational Church Choir of this place gave its ninth annual Oratorio Concert, on the 8th ult., at the Public Hall, when Handel's "Alexander's Feast," preceded by a miscellaneous programme, consisting of Overture "Dichter und Bauer" (Suppé); recitative and air, "Lend me your aid" ("Irene"), Gounod; trio, "This magic-wove scarf" ("Mountain Sylph"), Barnett; scena, "Infelice," Mendelssohn; solo, "The Lord worketh wonders," Handel; and solo and chorus, "From Thy love as a Father" ("Redemption"), Gounod, all very successfully rendered. The chorus numbered 200, and the principal vocalists were Miss S. A. Jenkins and Messrs. Herbert Williams and Thomas Hughes. Mr. D. Williams accompanied, and the Rev. David Williams conducted. The chorus fully sustained its high reputation, and the soloists were enthusiastically received.

BRISTOL.—Dr. Pearce, on the 19th ult., distributed, in the All Saints' Lecture Hall, the prizes to the successful candidates at the Bristol and Clifton Training School of Music; and Mrs. Weaver, the directress of the school, read a paper on "Some thoughts on musical art."

CHARLTON.—Mr. R. W. Browne played an attractive selection of organ music at St. Luke's Church, on June 27. Vocal solos were contributed by Mr. Frederic Leeds.

EASTBOURNE.—Miss May Kühn-Stroh, a young pianist of great promise, gave a successful Recital, on the 11th ult., in the Town Hall. Her programme contained an excellent selection from the works of Beethoven, Chopin, Liszt, and Brahms.

EXETER.—The annual Festival of the Exeter Diocesan Choral Association was celebrated on the 2nd ult., in the Cathedral, in the presence of a large congregation. The opening processional hymn, specially written by Mr. Childs Clarke and set to music by the Cathedral Organist, Mr. D. J. Wood, was effectively sung, as were also the special Psalms, which were pointed according to the Cathedral Psalter. The anthem was "Magnify His Name," by Dr. Martin. Thirty-six parish choirs took part, the voices numbering 1,090. Mr. T. Rowlands Smith conducted with his usual ability, and received able assistance from Mr. S. Bradbury, Mr. W. J. Bown, Mr. F. Harris, and Mr. W. L. Twining.

HANLEY.—At the Victoria Hall, on the 14th ult., Mr. J. Garner's Choir rendered a selection of sacred music in connection with the Friendly Societies' Amalgamated Parade. Mr. C. L. Forrester was the soloist.—The special Choir Services of the Hanley Catholic Church reached a high standard of musical excellence. Gounod's "Messe Solennelle" and Crookall's "Surge, amica mea," were included in a lengthy service. Mr. B. J. R. Emery presided at the organ and Mr. Akid led the orchestra.—The Town Council has decided to hold a ballot for the balcony seats for the Meakin Popular Concerts of next season. The growing demand for these special tickets has led to this decision.—The Hanley Vocal Union held a very successful Concert, on the 18th ult., at the Central Hall.

HEADINGLEY, LEEDS.—Mr. W. E. Belcher, organist of St. Michael's Church, gave his first Recital, in this church, on June 25, when he played an excellent selection of organ music.

KIMBERLEY, AFRICA.—An excellent Concert was given, on June 6, by Miss Morton in the Town Hall. Miss Morton's young but promising choral society sang "The Miller's Wooing," "Come, Dorothy, come," "Now tramp o'er moss and fell," and other glees and part-songs in a meritorious and appreciated manner, and much applause was elicited from a numerous audience by the singing of Miss Morton, Mrs. W. W. Alexander, Mrs. Atkinson, Miss Büchier, Mr. B. Edwards, and Mr. E. Vincent. Miss Jones and Miss V. Harris respectively contributed pianoforte and violin solos, and Mr. J. W. Ellison was a sympathetic accompanist.

LOWESTOFT.—A new operetta, entitled "The Gitana," by Mr. Leon Schlesinger, was successfully produced under the direction of the composer, on June 29, in the Pier Concert-room. The characters were effectively sustained by the Misses Emma and Susetta Fenn and Mr. Sinclair Dunn, who previously took part in a miscellaneous Concert, at which Dr. Bunnett contributed some pianoforte solos.

MARLBOROUGH.—The annual Concert of the Marlborough Choral Society was held on the 2nd ult., in the Town Hall, when Gaul's cantata "Una" was produced, under the direction of Mr. W. S. Bambridge. The solos were admirably sung by Mrs. Jeans, Miss Beatrice Chambers, Mr. R. H. Peyton, and Mr. Stuart Higgs, all of whom are amateurs of the district; and the accompaniments were played with much skill on the pianoforte by Miss Annie Greenland. The singing of the chorus throughout the work was deserving of high commendation. The second part of the Concert, which was miscellaneous, included an excellent performance of Max Bruch's "Swedish Dances," for violin solo, by Miss Olive Bell, as well as some capital gleesinging by the members of the Society.

NORTH BERWICK.—The first of a promising series of Organ Recitals was given, on June 27, in St. Baldred's Church, by Mr. T. Saunders Guyer, whose programme included Rheinberger's recently written Organ Sonata (No. 17) in B.

NOTTINGHAM.—The fifty-first anniversary of the patronal Festival of St. John's Church, Leen-side, was celebrated, on June 30, when an impressive performance was given of Schubert's fine Mass in B flat. The rendering of the choral numbers reflected great credit on the training abilities of the choir-master, Mr. Arthur Richards, and the solo parts were effectively sung by Miss Bentley, Mr. W. Hinks, Mr. C. Gering, and H. Pyatt. Mr. S. B. Furley presided at the organ.

OXFORD.—The fifteenth annual Festival of the Epping Forest Church Choir Association was held at Christ Church Cathedral, by kind permission of the Dean and Chapter, on the 13th ult. The choirs represented were St. Andrew's, St. Columba's, and St. Augustine's, Leytonstone; St. Saviour's, Forest Gate; Holy Trinity, Hermon Hill; All Saints', Woodford; St. John's and St. Stephen's, Buckhurst Hill; All Saints', Chigwell Row; and St. Mary's, Chigwell; in all about 250 voices. The Magnificat and Nunc dimittis were by Myles Foster in A and the anthem was Gadsby's "O Lord our Governor." Beethoven's "Hallelujah Chorus" was sung at the end of the service in place of the usual festival Te Deum. Brass instruments were used with excellent effect in the opening processional hymn, "Lift high the Cross," to the tune by Baden Powell. Mr. Henry Riding presided at the organ and the whole of the service and arrangements were under the direction of the choir-master, Mr. J. W. Ulyett.

SADDLEWORTH.—The annual Choir Festival was celebrated in the Parish Church on June 30. The anthems sung at the services were Wesley's "Blessed be the God and Father," Mendelssohn's "Hear my Prayer," and Barnby's "King all-glorious"; the soloists were the Misses Holden, Gardner, and R. Tavis (the last-named singing the solo in the Motet), and Mr. J. Shaw and Mr. J. W. Tanner. Mr. Herbert Whitley presided at the organ.

STAFFORD.—The Festival of the choirs of the rural deaneries of Stafford was celebrated, on the 9th ult., in St. Mary's Church. Some two hundred voices assisted at the Services, at which were sung the anthem "Lift up your heads" (Hopkins), "With verdure clad" (Haydn), and Mendelssohn's motet "Hear my Prayer," the soloist of the two last-named being Master Edgar Ford. Dr. Taylor, to whom great praise is due for the impressive manner in which the choral music was rendered, conducted with skill, and the organ accompaniments were excellently played by the Rev. T. H. Spinney. The success of the Festival would seem to call for a like celebration taking place annually.

TURRO.—A Concert was given in the Public Rooms, on June 25, in aid of the Truro Grammar School Cricket Club. The programme was ably sustained by ladies and gentlemen from Truro and neighbourhood who gave their services, assisted by Mr. Bishop. Mr. C. W. Robinson and Mr. Mountford of Truro shared the accompaniments. Miss E. Childs Clarke and Miss K. R. Foster, vocal pupils of Mr. C. W. Robinson, appeared for the first time in Truro, and had a very gratifying reception.

WANSTEAD.—Two successful al fresco Concerts were given in the grounds of the Hermitage, on June 27, when solos, duets, part-songs, &c., were given by a select choir under the direction of Mr. Henry Riding.

WELLINGTON, N.Z.—A successful performance of Messrs. Gilbert and Sullivan's comic opera "Ruddigore" was given on May 23, under the experienced and energetic direction of Mr. Tallis Trimmell, at the Opera House. The chief characters were effectively embodied by Miss Newton, Mrs. Miller, Mrs. Burfoot, Mr. E. J. Hill, Mr. Parsons, and Mr. Mabin. The choruses were well sung, the dances neatly executed, and a competent orchestra was ably led by Mr. MacDuff Boyd.

ORGAN APPOINTMENTS.—Mr. Henry E. Dalby, Organist and Choirmaster to Welford Parish Church, Rugby.—Mr. Stretton Swann, Organist and Choirmaster to St. John's, Horselydown.—Mr. Charles Lee, Organist and Choirmaster to Holy Trinity, Hoxton.—Mr. Edward R. Broome, Organist and Choirmaster to St. James's Episcopal Church, Cupar, Fife.—Mr. Ralph Dudge, Organist and Choirmaster to Crathie Church, Aberdeenshire.

CHOIR APPOINTMENT.—Mr. Lawrence P. White (Alto), to St. Luke's, Westbourne Park.

NOTE.—The custom which prevails in schools of allowing pupils to play in unison, to the practical exclusion of part-playing, has suggested the need of such pieces as are contained in these volumes; and it is hoped that, besides providing for the want that is felt, they will also tend to modify the custom.—GEORGE CALKIN.

ALFRED R. GAUL'S CANTATAS.

* UNA

4TH AND 5TH THOUSAND.

PRODUCED AT THE NORWICH MUSICAL FESTIVAL,
OCTOBER 4, 1893."Una' is quite one of his best."—Musical Standard.

"The result, in the present case, leaves no doubt that into all the places which know his previous compositions 'Una' will find a way and become as much a favourite as its forerunners. . . . Mr. Gaul considers before all things the elegance and symmetry of his melodic phrases."—Musical Times.

"We believe that Mr. Gaul has attained greater popularity with small English provincial choral societies than any other composer, living or dead."—London Daily Graphic.

† THE TEN VIRGINS

Third Edition. Seventh and Eighth Thousand.

This Edition contains the additional Soprano air "Sun of my Soul."

"The work was certainly go through Saxondom in the wake of its predecessors from the same pen."—London Daily Telegraph.

"Must attain popularity wherever heard. Infinitely superior to any previous effort of the composer."—Liverpool Daily Courier.

"A distinct advance upon any of its predecessors."—Birmingham Daily Post.

"That 'The Ten Virgins' is a much finer work than the everywhere favourite 'Holy City' we have no doubt whatever."—Birmingham Daily Gazette.

PRODUCED WITH THE UTMOST SUCCESS BY THE
BIRMINGHAM FESTIVAL CHORAL SOCIETY.

* JOAN OF ARC

Staff Edition. Sixteenth to Twentieth Thousand.

"The Exeter Oratorio Society last night achieved a brilliant success, and it may safely be said, without fear of exaggeration, that never before have they performed a work more satisfactory to themselves or more interesting to the audience than 'Joan of Arc.'"—Western Times.

"One of the most delightful Concerts ever given by the South Shields Choral Society was that of last evening, when the principal piece was 'Joan of Arc.' We cannot speak too highly of Mr. Gaul's work, which is of the most interesting description, and will doubtless soon be a favourite with choral societies."—Shields Daily News.

5TH AND 6TH THOUSAND.

PRODUCED AT THE CRYSTAL PALACE, JULY 9, 1892.

† ISRAEL IN THE WILDERNESS

"The work was given under Mr. Gaul's own direction by some 3,000 singers, accompanied by the Palace Orchestra. Mr. Gaul has presented in no previous work better characteristics or more successful efforts than to be found in 'Israel in the Wilderness.' The popular composer was enthusiastically cheered at the close of the performance."—Musical News.

The above Cantatas have been specially planned to meet the requirements of Musical Societies, the greater portion being choral.

Price, paper cover, 2s. 6d.; paper boards, 3s.; cloth, gilt, 4s.; Tonic Sol-fa, 1s.; vocal parts, each 1s. Words only, * 7s. 6d.; † 5s. per 100.

PREFACE.

This "Elementary Primer for the Pianoforte" aims at supplying "beginners" with a "Method" to be used from end to end in the order in which it is compiled.Although "Pianoforte Instructors" are as numerous as the sands of the sea, I claim for this one that it is quite original not only in its progressive order, but also in the language employed.Convinced that it is worse than useless to crowd a child's mind with words which, to that child, convey no meaning, I have studiously used only such words as a child with moderate intelligence can be expected to understand.The student must, before attempting to play, acquire a correct and unerring mental picture of the arrangement of the keyboard.Counting aloud should become a habit from the very first finger-exercises.The customary "Household melodies" have been carefully avoided, because I confidently believe that, while engaged on a familiar melody, the student is unconsciously playing more or less "by ear," even correcting his own errors that way—instead of "reading" (deciphering) every note of the Piece.Diatonic Scales are not included. Till the student is sufficiently advanced to be taught the construction of major and minor scales, he is better without "scales" at all; and it does not come within the scope of an "Elementary Primer" to teach all that "the Scales" imply.Some Scale-passages, however, with no necessary tonality, are included.The so-called "English" fingering has been discarded in favour of the more universal "foreign" fingering.

ORATORIOS

BY

GEO. SHINN, MUS. BAC., CANTAB.

SUITABLE FOR CONCERT-ROOM OR CHURCH.

The following Works contain many effective Solos and Choruses of moderate difficulty, and will take about an hour and a half in performance.

Twelfth Thousand.

THE CAPTIVES OF BABYLON.

Price 2s.; paper boards, 2s. 6d.; cloth, 3s. 6d.; Sol-fa, 1s.

"In our judgment no better work of the kind has yet been published. It is brimful of pretty melodies, and the harmonic effects show the skill of a painstaking and talented musician."—Free Methodist.

"The libretto is well chosen, and forms a good base whereon to compose a first-rate work. With regard to the music we feel we can hardly do it justice. . . . Where all is so good it is difficult to mention any special numbers."—United Service Gazette.

LAZARUS OF BETHANY.

Price 2s.; paper boards, 2s. 6d.; cloth, 3s. 6d.; Sol-fa, 1s.

"Mr. Shinn is entitled to warm praise for his Oratorio, since it is obviously written to provide choirs of moderate capabilities with a work not too long, not too difficult, but with melodic and musician-like, and, above all, faithful in its representation of the dramatic incidents of its sacred narrative. Upon all these grounds Mr. Shinn can claim a success."—The Keyboard.

"The work contains some remarkably well-written solos and choruses. There are two exquisite bass solos, and a quartet, 'Blessed are the dead,' is a lovely piece of part-writing. The concluding fugue, 'Hallelujah Amen,' is a fitting climax to the work."—Sussex Daily News.

SINGING MASTER

CONTAINING

ADVICE TO THE MASTER AND STUDENT, EXERCISES, VOCALIZZI, &c.

By CHARLES SANTLEY.

IN TWO PARTS, PRICE FOUR SHILLINGS NET EACH.

OPINIONS OF THE PRESS.

"Any words emanating from such a master of vocal art as Mr. Santley are worthy of consideration and the appearance of the first instalment of a Tutor from his pen must receive attention. Mr. Santley also gives hints to teachers, his instructions with respect to the blending of the registers are well worthy of note, as are the examples illustrating the difference between good and bad methods of vocalisation."—Athenæum.

"This is a capital work, and is worthy of the attention of the studios. The exercises comprised in the work are the basis of singing, and should be invaluable to those desirous of cultivating their vocal powers."—Civil Service Gazette.

"This new and valuable volume, which has just been published, is an excellent addition to the vocalist's library. The work is one which recommends itself to all who wish to study the art of vocalisation."—Times.

"Messrs. Chappell and Co. have just published the first part of 'Santley's Singing Master,' which contains a series of more than seventy admirably graduated vocal exercises, and a preface and an introduction in which the famous baritone gives much sensible advice to both teachers and students."—Manchester Guardian.

"This new Singing Tutor, by the greatest of English baritones, is most welcome, and students and teachers will find it an exceedingly valuable book. The instructions to masters and pupils will be found of great value to both. The handbook is comprehensive and cheap, and no doubt will receive the welcome it deserves on its merits."—The Freeman's Journal.

THE BEHNKE VOICE-TRAINING METHOD.

Price, in paper covers, Two Shillings; in cloth, Three Shillings.

VOICE-TRAINING PRIMER

By MRS. EMIL BEHNKE AND DR. CHARLES W. PEARCE.

An easy Catechism of Vocal Physiology and Musical Theory, for the use of Vocal Students generally. This work is also intended as a Text-book for preparing Candidates for Vocal Examinations, particularly those of the Associated Board of the R.C.M. and R.A.M., the Incorporated Society of Musicians, and Trinity College, London. It contains in one volume all the information required for answering the viva voce questions of Examiners.

Sixtieth Thousand. Price, in paper covers, One Shilling and Sixpence; in cloth, Three Shillings.

VOICE-TRAINING EXERCISES

In Six separate Books, for Soprano, Mezzo-Soprano, Contralto, Tenor, Baritone, and Bass.

By EMIL BEHNKE AND DR. CHARLES W. PEARCE.

"Admirable, and doubtless will prove of great utility."—Rev. Sir F. A. Gore Ouseley."Far more precise in plan than anything I have seen."—Sir R. P. Stewart."Scientific, systematic, and ingenious."—Sir John Stainer.

Third and Improved Edition. Price, in paper covers, One Shilling and Sixpence; in cloth, Three Shillings.

VOICE-TRAINING STUDIES

In Six separate Books, for Soprano, Mezzo-Soprano, Contralto, Tenor, Baritone, and Bass.

By EMIL BEHNKE AND DR. CHARLES W. PEARCE.

"This work contains 24 Progressive Studies in different styles, and is intended as a companion or supplementary volume to 'Voice-Training Exercises.' Those of a more cantabile character are to be used as Solfeggi, the others are to be sung as Vocalises. In this Second Edition the accompaniments have been simplified. Highly favourable opinions of these Studies have been expressed by Sir John Stainer, Sir Robert Stewart, Mr. W. H. Cummings, and other eminent authorities."

"There can be little doubt that these 'Studies,' which are published in separate keys for all voices, will share the popularity of the 'Exercises.'"—Sunday Times.

"We have no doubt that the second volume will equal the first in popularity."—Morning Post.

"I am glad to find you are still going ahead in your valuable sphere of work. The 'Voice-Training Studies' are a solid and sound contribution to the repertory of teachers and students."—Sir John Stainer.

"Your new book of 'Voice-Training Studies' is admirable, and will prove of very great value to students and teachers. I like it much."—C. Vincent, Mus. Doc.

PRESIDENT:

SIR RICHARD E. WEBSTER, G.C.M.G., Q.C., M.P.

Warden: Professor E. H. TURPIN, Mus.D.

Director of Studies: Professor BRADBURY TURNER, Mus.B.

MICHAELMAS TERM begins on Tuesday, October 1. New Students will be admitted on September 28 and 30, at 11 o'clock. Both day and evening classes are held.

The Inaugural Address will be delivered by the Warden on TUESDAY, October 1, at FOUR o'clock. Subject: "Natural Principles and Artistic Methods."

An Organ Recital will be given by Mr. F. G. M. Ogbourne on Thursday, October 10.

A Course of Lectures will be delivered by the Warden on the "Theory and Practice of Conducting and Management of Orchestral and Choral Performances."

STUDENTS of the College (Professional or Amateur) can receive instruction in all branches of music under eminent Professors.

For a Course of four Studies, a principal one (thirty minutes), a secondary one (twenty minutes), as well as a Theory Class subject and Sight-Singing, the fee is FIVE GUINEAS. For two principal Studies (of thirty minutes), a Theory Class subject and Sight-Singing, the fee is SIX GUINEAS. Students may enter for one subject at THREE GUINEAS a Term, for weekly lessons of thirty minutes, in any of the following subjects: Pianoforte, Solo Singing, Organ, Violin, Violoncello, Flute, Oboe, Clarinet, Harp, Horn, Trumpet, Double Bass, &c., Figured Bass Playing, Pianoforte Accompaniment, or Elocution. The class fee for Harmony, Counterpoint, Form, Instrumentation, Voice Production, Acoustics, Elocution, French, German, or Italian, is ONE GUINEA a Term.

The following Scholarships and Exhibitions are open to all-comers: The Henry Smart Scholarship (tenable for three years), The Queen Victoria Scholarship (tenable for three years), the Sir Julius Benedict Pianoforte Exhibition, the Sims Reeves Vocal Exhibition, the College Organ Exhibition, the College Violin Exhibition, the College Viola Exhibition, the College Violoncello Exhibition, and the College Double Bass Exhibition (all tenable for one year), and eight other Scholarships tenable for three years.

The Tuition of the College is intended to serve as a preparative for the Higher and Local Examinations of the College, and for other public examinations, including the examinations for University degrees.

Weekly Lectures are delivered by the Warden during Term, and are especially addressed to Students intending to enter for the Higher Examinations. The Lectures are free to all Students.

Students' Concerts are given at the College at intervals during Term, and usually at the end of each Term an Orchestral Concert is given at Princes' Hall.

The Orchestral Class meets each Saturday during Term at four o'clock, under the direction of Mr. F. Corder.

A Class will be held for the study of Wind Instrument Chamber Music on Monday evenings, conducted by Mr. John R. Radcliff.

A Class for the Study of "Musical Gestures" will be conducted by Mr. H. Davan Wetton, Mus.B., under the personal superintendence of Professor J. F. Bridge, Mus.D.

Prospectuses and all further information may be obtained from the undersigned.

BEAUTY IN MUSIC.

"Must it be then only with our poets that we insist they shall either create for us the image of a noble morality, or among us create none? or shall we not also keep guard over all other workers for the people, and forbid them to make what is ill-customed, and unrestrained, and ungentle, and without order or shape, either in likenesses of living things, or in buildings, or in any other thing whatsoever that is made for the people? and shall we not rather seek for workers who can track the inner nature of all that may be sweetly schemed; so that the young men, as living in a wholesome place, may be profited by everything that, in work fairly wrought, may touch them through hearing or sight—as if it were a breeze bringing health to them from places strong for life?"

This is Mr. Ruskin's translation of a passage in Plato's Republic, and I have put it where it stands partly for the impressiveness of a voice uttering eternal truth out of the far-distant Past, but in greater part for the sake of the truth itself, which is as vital at the present moment as when the antique Sage penned his thoughts, and no less applicable to forms of effort developed since his time than to the labours in which his contemporaries engaged. With the same text purpose I now give an extract from our modern Teacher's inaugural Oxford Lecture, 1870:

"Now the first necessity for the doing of any great work in ideal art is the looking upon all foulness with horror, as a contemptible, though dreadful, enemy. You may easily understand what I mean by comparing the feelings with which Dante regards any form of obscenity or base jest with the temper in which the same things are regarded by Shakespeare. And this strange, earthly instinct of ours, coupled as it is, in our good men, with great simplicity and common sense, renders them shrewd and perfect observers and delineators of actual nature, low or high, but precludes them from that speciality of art which we properly call sublime. If ever we try anything in the manner of Michael Angelo or of Dante, we catch a fall, even in literature, as Milton in the battle of the Angels, spoiled from Hesiod; while in art, every attempt in this style has hitherto been the sign either of the presumptuous egotism of persons who have never really learned to be workmen, or it has been connected with very tragic forms of the contemplation of death—it has always been partly insane, and never once wholly successful."

I have now evoked from the ancient philosopher the counsel that all work should be orderly, restrained, shapely, the image of a noble morality; and I have caused the greatest art-critic of the time now present to express on this page his horror of whatever is foul and degrading; also to open for us the great question of limitations, dulness of vision as to which has caused so many disasters in art, and, not least, in the art of music.

Here it may be pointed out, as a matter of interest to Englishmen, that the extract from Ruskin belongs to a passage designed to show the existence of a very important disability in our British race. The lecturer contends that among our "quite essential" characteristics is "a delight in the forms of burlesque which are connected in some degree with the foulness in evil," and he puts forward Chaucer, that example of a true English mind in the best possible temper, as a case in point, adding that "the power of listening to and enjoying the jesting of entirely gross persons, whatever the feeling may be which permits it, afterwards degenerated into forms of humour which render some of quite the greatest, wisest, and most moral of English writers now almost useless for our youth." This is not a subject for present discussion, but, nevertheless, one which belongs to the more general question of limitations afterwards touched upon in the present paper.

The main points before us are these: First (with Plato), all works should be beautiful. Second (with Ruskin), all workers should avoid whatever is inconsistent with beauty. It may be objected that these propositions mean the same, but more acute readers will see that though they touch each other, they are not in every respect each other's equivalent.

All musical work should be beautiful—that is to say, regular in form (which by no means implies formality), restrained in expression, within the limits imposed by the general law of art, pleasing alike to ear and mind and elevating in tendency. My definition substantially agrees with that involved in a passage from Bishop Beveridge: "It (music) calls in my spirits, composes my thoughts, delights my ear, recreates my mind, and so not only fits me for after business but fills my heart, at the present, with pure and useful thoughts; so that when the music sounds the sweetliest in my ears, truth commonly flows the clearest into my mind. And hence it is that I find my soul is become more harmonious by being accustomed so much to harmony and so averse to all manners of discord that the least jarring sounds, either in notes or words, seem very harsh and unpleasant to me." There will hardly be dissent from the foregoing as regards the highest form of music—that which we know as "pure" or abstract. Composers have no excuse for any kind or degree of ugliness—to use a comprehensive and convenient word—in this exalted branch of their art, because nothing can be considered as even an approximately adequate temptation thereto. That some have perpetrated ugliness under these conditions is a melancholy fact, involving in many cases the shame properly belonging to those who are gratuitously offensive, and sin against light. Among them may be counted the men by whom eccentricity is cultivated as a means of attracting attention, and who throw themselves into mock convulsions to pass, if haply they may, as oracles. I am convinced, against my will, that the number of such offenders is increasing, not, perhaps, in regard to "pure" orchestral music, which, now, is seldom written at all, but certainly with reference to concerted instrumental works for the chamber, where, instead of the clearness, charm, and refinement of the classical masters, we are often called upon to suffer turgidity, coarseness, and that form of vulgarity which, as when a vulgar man essays to speak, consists in extravagant emphasis, redundant utterance, and obscurity of sense. As a rule, this kind of work utterly fails. There appears to be something in the atmosphere of chamber music which will have none of such things, except as a passing and soon to be forgotten experience. Why, then, do composers go on with it? For the reason, as it appears to me, that, able to do nothing better, they must do that or nothing at all—a dreadful alternative, not for a moment to be contemplated. Doubtless we should have plenty of new chamber works emulous of the beauty of the great masters if the mind and hand of the present-day composer were as full of knowledge and skill as theirs. But alas! he is generally built upon a foundation other than that which gave stability and power to his predecessors. He shares the hurry of his age. He reaches forward to the things which are before—very much before, and, like Bunyan's Ignorance, finds, after dodging the dangers of pilgrimage, that there is a way to Inferno at the very gate of Paradise. He will not stay to equip himself for his task—to become possessed of every technical resource, to acquire the cunning hand and the subtle sense which distinguish a master. By no such person can a great thing be done, though he may produce works acceptable to a public as imperfectly qualified to judge as he to create. "All inferior artists," says a writer before quoted, "are continually trying to escape from the necessity of sound work, and either indulging themselves in their delights in subject, or pluming themselves on their noble motives for attempting what they cannot perform (and observe, by the way, that a great deal of what is mistaken for conscientious motive is nothing but a very pestilent, because very subtle, condition of vanity); whereas the great men always understand at once that the first morality of a painter, as of everybody else, is to know his business; and so earnest are they in this, that many whose lives, you would think, by the results of their work, had been passed in strong emotion, have, in reality, subdued themselves, though capable of the very strongest passions, into a calm as absolute as that of a deeply sheltered mountain lake, which reflects every agitation of the clouds in the sky, and every change of the shadows on the hills, but is itself motionless." Only from such men can beautiful work proceed, for artistic beauty implies in its creator the severest study and self-discipline, united to infinite patience and painstaking, or else it indicates nothing less than the divine endowment of genius, which now might be invoked in the words of William Blake:—

How have you left the antient love
The bards of old enjoyed in you!
The languid strings do scarcely move;
The sound is forced, the notes are few.

Leaving genius out of the question, how many of the qualities of beauty do we see in the "pure" music of to-day? How often, on the other hand, do we note slovenly craftsmanship, bombastic manners, and efforts to make up for poverty of thought and skill by plentiful utterance? This is the penalty paid, in a department of music which, more than any other, exacts good workmanship, for lack of patience and sincerity, and for the existence of haste and vanity.

Because of the remarks foregoing, and the stress they lay upon knowledge and skill, I must not be assumed to reckon those qualities as sufficient in themselves for the creation of high forms of musical beauty. But I do contend that there cannot be musical beauty without them, and I hold that even poverty of thought is atoned for, in no small measure, by correctness and grace of expression. Whether this combination is better or worse than wealth of idea and uncouthness of utterance, is a nice point which may not now be discussed. In any case, and speaking entirely for myself, I want no music that does not prove its creator to have been striving after, and faithful to, the first principles of beauty, which also are the first principles of art.

Coming to the question of applied music—"programme music"—it is evident that the conditions upon which the observations above made have been based do not altogether exist. In the case of "pure" music there is no possible excuse for sacrifice of beauty, since the composer is absolutely free; but when a "programme" has to be illustrated, circumstances are conceivable in which beauty necessarily gives way to fidelity. Modern composers know those circumstances well, and with the consequences of their knowledge we are, in certain cases, unpleasantly familiar. I may be allowed to put forward Saint-Saëns's grotesque "Danse Macabre" as an example. The illustration of such a subject as that chosen by the French master does not call for beauty, but rather for its opposite, and it must be said that the composer remained faithful to the conditions under which he elected to place himself. At this point a serious question arises—namely, whether an artist is justified in assuming obligations which compel him to ignore the essential principles and the raison d'être of his art. If the right answer be a negative, then every bit of unbeautiful music stands condemned.

In discussing this part of the subject it may be well, first of all, to look at the necessities out of which unbeautiful music arises, in the circumstances above pointed out. One such is often found in the inability of the art to produce the effects desired. The faculties of music, boundless in their own proper sphere, are limited elsewhere. Their directly imitative power is small, while, in suggestion, they are so vague that occasions are few in which two unaided minds would agree as to the nature of the thing suggested. This vagueness tempts composers to measures hardly to be contemplated were the descriptive and pictorial language at their command more definite. Hence we find music put to the strangest and most impossible tasks—to purposes, also, with which, in its nature, it can have nothing whatever to do. An example may be taken from Wagner's "Siegfried." The composer of that work was within the directly imitative means of his art when writing the bird music, as was Beethoven in a famous (and regrettable) passage of the "Pastoral" Symphony. But Wagner went altogether outside of music, and beyond the domain of art, in the dreadful noises which precede and attend upon the appearance of Fafner the Worm. We cannot recognise those noises as imitative, because none of us has ever heard a Worm, and art of any kind, even of the lowest, they certainly are not. In this case, the composer was tempted, not to realism, because there are no dragons and, consequently, no dragonian sounds, but into an uncouth fancy, with results which might—though it seems they do not—upset the portentous gravity and discompose the simple faith even of a Wagnerian audience. In all such cases—and there are not a few—music is abused; that is to say, put to work for which it is unfitted and with which its qualities are incompatible. This is pitiful. When Miranda saw Ferdinand carrying logs she offered to bear them herself, and added:

It would become me
As well as it does you; and I should do t
With much more ease, for my good will is to it
And yours it is against.

So, were the thing possible, would some of us do for fair and gentle Music the dirty work to which she is not seldom put.

There is, as already indicated, a second category of tasks, to be repudiated, not as lying beyond the bounds within which music can operate, but as tending to artistic degradation by unsuitability of subject. These are found in all the arts, and, as they exist in painting, have more than once kindled the Ruskinian fire, or fanned it into a fierce and consuming flame. Noticing the alliance of realistic art and religion, the great critic protests that, in its lowest branches, art addresses itself to "the mere thirst for sensation of horror which characterises the uneducated orders of partially civilised countries." He goes on: "The same morbid instinct has also affected the minds of many among the more imaginative and powerful artists with a feverish gloom which distorts their finest work." The Teacher would have his great and beautiful art come away from contemplation of agony, from the smell of the charnel house and the reek of the shambles. "The wretched in death," he exclaims, "you have always with you. Yes, and the brave and good in life you have always. . . . And you will find, if you look into history with this clue, that one of quite the chief reasons for the continual misery of mankind is that they are always divided in their worship between angels or saints, who are out of their sight and need no help, and proud and evil-minded men, who are too definitely in their sight, and ought not to have their help. And consider how the arts have thus followed the worship of the crowd. You have paintings of saints and angels innumerable; of petty courtiers and contemptible and cruel kings innumerable. Few, how few you have (but these, observe, almost always by great painters) of the best men, or of their actions." I have chosen this pregnant passage from among many others because of its special parallelism with certain modern phenomena in music. That art, as well as painting, suffers from a tendency towards unworthy themes, some low and degrading, others profitless if not harmful, and all lacking in the qualities which promote cheerfulness, refinement, and elevating delights. But it is mainly of such subjects as are dealt with by Berlioz in his "Ride to the Abyss" ("La Damnation de Faust") and certain parts of the "Symphonie Fantastique"; by Raff in the Finale of the "Leonora" Symphony, by Saint-Saëns in the "Danse Macabre," by Wagner in the "Venusberg" scene of "Tannhäuser"—the morbid, the horrible, the lascivious—it is of these that I would chiefly speak. The application of art to such themes may be due, perhaps, to some primitive and savage instinct, and we have already heard the thirst for sensation of horror described as characterising the uneducated orders of partially civilised countries. I am much afraid that this peculiar craving is not confined to the crude masses of humanity, and I know that the educated are ready to drink of sensation of horror whenever the cup comes decked by art—and not then only. This is the reverse of real taste, which implies feeling for truth and all that is noble, eyes to see and a heart to love beauty and order wherever and however they present themselves.

How may the present disposition to ally our art with unworthy subjects be accounted for? Is it simply a survival of the primitive man, brought into life and activity by the presence within the realm of music of a half-educated crowd, to whom modern facilities have given admission? or is it a sign of the degeneracy which, if we believe a contemporary writer, is spreading and deepening all around us? Or, again, is it fostered by an age of mediocrity—an age in which no great creative genius moves, like the quickening Spirit of old, over the face of stagnation. Everything which ceases to advance begins to go back though it seems to stand still. Immobility is the parent of corruption:—

Day after day, day after day,
We stuck, nor breath nor motion,
As idle as a painted ship
Upon a painted ocean.

* * * *

The very deep did rot: O Christ!
That ever this should be!
Yea, slimy things did crawl with legs,
Upon the slimy sea!

The creatures seen by the poet were not evidence of life but of death, and when "the good south wind sprang up behind" they found their death in life.

I have touched but a part of my subject and must return to it, at a convenient time, for the sake of considerations more cheerful and, to some extent, re-assuring. Meanwhile let thoughtful readers ponder the question what may be done to reinfuse the spirit of beauty into those developments of modern music from which it seems to have departed.

JOSEPH BENNETT.

THE EVOLUTION OF POLYPHONY.

II.

"HE who would understand the Middle Ages must make a special study of the thirteenth century, one of the landmarks between the ancient and modern world, one of the most pregnant, most organic, most memorable in the annals of mankind. It is an epoch (perhaps the last of which this can be said) crowded with names illustrious in action, in thought, in art, in religion, equally; which is big with those problems, intellectual, social, political, and spiritual, that six succeeding centuries have in vain toiled to solve." This summary of the epoch in question, from the pen of that brilliant writer, Mr. Frederick Harrison, supplies us with a convenient beginning for the second portion of our interesting task, since, of course, those influences that led to the intellectual and spiritual activity here described could not fail also to exert their beneficent effects upon the progress of music.

Mr. Harrison is, however, careful to point out that although for convenience sake we are obliged to designate each century by a number, it will not do to invest such signs with too literal a signification. The label-numbers, in short, by which we designate the centuries are indications rather of epochs than of dates. And Mr. Harrison begins his "thirteenth" century, not with the year 1201, but with 1198, and ends it with 1308. Similarly, our first example of thirteenth century music (from a three-part piece in the "Chansonnier de Montpellier") is stated by Coussemaker, who first published it, to have been composed at the end of the twelfth century. It shows, however, such an advance on the best foreign examples of twelfth century music, as regards the expression, the melodic and rhythmic independence of each part, and the harmonic combinations, that it belongs by right to the thirteenth century. Coussemaker gives excellent reasons for believing it to be the composition of Franco of Cologne (not to be confounded with Franco of Paris, who flourished much earlier); if his inference be correct, Magister Franco was clearly entitled to rank among the most accomplished musicians of his time. Of the three melodies here combined, two—the chief theme, "Ave Gloriosa," and the bass—are found also in the thirteenth century "Reading MS." of the British Museum—that which contains the oldest copy known of "Sumer is icumen in." There, however, the top portion (or triplum) is quite different, as may be seen by reference to the article "Score" in Grove's Dictionary of Music and Musicians, which includes fac-similes of this and other three-part songs inscribed during the first third of the thirteenth century. When each of the three melodies here combined with such success was composed, and by whom, it is not our present purpose to enquire—in those days "composition" meant literally a "putting together" or placing in position, and did not of necessity include the invention of any of the parts so combined. It will be noticed that the phrases of the highest part contain five bars each; those of the next, eight—divisible into two fours; and those of the bass three, with an empty bar between. If the uppermost theme be sung alone, its remarkably modern character will strike every ear. It is a melody that might have been written by Beethoven; indeed, is not unlike one that occurs in one of his posthumous quartets:—

8ve lower.

A - ve vir - go re - gi - na, Ma - ter cle - men - ti - æ, 8ve lower.

A - ve glo - ri - o - sa . . Ma - ter

Domino

Virgo, &c.

sal - va - to - ris, A - ve, &c.

Our next example is a secular piece comprising two themes. The principal of these, "Prennez y garde," a song very popular in the thirteenth century, furnishes the material for the two upper parts, which are so written as to form a series of imitations that, as regards their rhythm, might have been composed in the sixteenth or seventeenth century. This piece, forty-four bars long, was also found in the Montpellier Song Book. Its composer's name is unknown, but its epoch is the first quarter of the thirteenth century:—

Sue lower.

S'on me re - gar - de, s'on me re - gar - de

Sue lower.

Pre - nez y gar - de, s'on me re - gar - de

He! mi en - fant

di - tes le moi. Trop suis gail - lar - de...

Trop suis gail - lar - de di - tes le moi.

&c.

The following combination of melodies is by the theorist and composer who wrote under the pseudonym of "Aristotle," and of whom all that is known with certainty is that he flourished between the last quarter of the twelfth and the first quarter of the thirteenth centuries, and that his renown was considerable. The variety of phrasing exhibited by the three voice parts is worthy of careful attention:—

A - mor vin - cens em - ni - a po -

Ma - ri - æ præ co - ni - o de -

Ap - ta - tur

- ten - ti - a vin - cit, &c.

vo - ti - o

&c.

&c.

Ap - ta - tur,

&c.

Here the observance of historical sequence would necessitate the quotation of "Sumer is icumen in," were it not that the piece is so well known that we are absolved from the necessity. Its great superiority as regards harmonic effect and multiplicity of parts over all contemporary productions needs no showing, for we have quoted the very best examples of foreign art at this period and omitted the worst. It proves, exactly as did the Cornish two-part song of the eleventh century given in our first article—though in a minor degree—that, as regards music, England in the Middle Ages was, roughly speaking, generally about a century in advance of other nations.

The Montpellier MS. contains several examples of "double counterpoint" of about the same epoch as "Sumer is icumen in," or probably a little later. Here is one:—

BALAAM.

It is evident that our famous English piece represents the high-water mark of European musical skill during the thirteenth century. Of the 340 pieces contained in the Montpellier book none are of later date than 1270, and of the latest ones none of course can compare with "Sumer is icumen in"—which, by the way, is included in that celebrated volume, a fact which shows how well it was appreciated abroad. The Montpellier MS., it may be well to state here, is believed to have been written out at the beginning of the fourteenth century. Apart from the latest pieces in this famous collection, examples of the polyphonic music composed during the second half of the thirteenth century are scarce. We have, however, a Mass, written throughout in three parts, the MS. of which is in the Cathedral at Tournai, and a few pieces for two and three voices by Adam de la Halle (1240-85), the famous Trouvère, whose songs are quoted in almost every history of music. Both the Mass and the complete musical compositions of La Halle (or Hale) have been published in modern notation by Coussemaker. We do not propose, however, to make extracts from either, because the progress they show as regards command of the various artifices that go to make up polyphonic writing is very slight. They differ in style from the examples we have already given by reason chiefly of the florid writing which occasionally shows itself in the upper parts. The Gloria of the Tournai Mass, for instance, contains innumerable triplet passages (three quavers each in a bar of common time) that remind one of Rossini and his school; and the middle voice of a three-part Motet by La Halle is practically in 9-8 time, while the other voices are in 3-4.

This trend in the direction of excessive ornamentation is naturally accompanied by a decrease of real melodic interest—the Motet just referred to being in this respect a conspicuous example. Its tonality is vague (one part is really in C, while the other two are in F!), and the florid melody of the middle voice sounds like the extemporised violin obbligato of a village fiddler. There can, however, be little doubt that these florid effects were ultimately beneficial to the art which, at first, they seemed to degrade. They accustomed the ear to distinguish more sharply between the essential and unessential notes of a prevailing harmony, and thus led musicians to the secret which had so long been hidden from them. It is only necessary to glance at the next two examples to see how great an advance had been made during the early years of the fourteenth century. The first is from a two-part song in the Cambrai Library; the second is a "Rondel" by Jeannot de Lescurel, taken from a MS. in the Paris Library (No. 6,812), which contains also a considerable number of other pieces by the same musician. Of the former the exact date is uncertain, but that of the "Rondel" is proved by other dates in the MS. to be anterior to 1320:—

Ve-nez a nue-ches sans de-tri-je vous
Ve-chi l'her-mi te-da-me-qui vous
re-sol-va, &c.

We give the "Rondel" in full:

A-vous-dou

The melody of the upper voice of this "Rondel" might have been written during the lifetime of Mozart. It is not impossible that the middle part alone was sung, the other parts being played on instruments. At any rate, the old system of singing two or three sets of words at the same time has entirely disappeared.

The examples with which we conclude our sketch are from the compositions of Italians.

The first, from a MS. dated 1375, is a song headed by the name "Johannes Florentinus." We give the first thirteen of its forty-seven bars:—

Qua - do a - mor . . gli oc - chi ri - lu - -

- cen - ti e - - - bel - li, &c.

34 more bars.

Finally, here is the opening of a piece by Francesco Landino, who was born at Florence about 1325, and though blind from his youth, became known as the greatest organist of his time. He died in 1390 in his native city:—

Non a - vi - à pietà, &c.

18 more bars.

Having now traced the gradual progress of polyphony during over 300 years, we leave the art at about the epoch of the birth of Dunstable. Its further development in the fifteenth century under that eminent Englishman and his disciples, Dufay and Binchois, and other composers of the Netherlands school, is within the knowledge of every educated musician.

FROM MY STUDY.

DANIEL FRANÇOIS ESPRIT AUBER, the pride and glory of opéra comique, came of a Norman stock, and was born in the province of his fathers, at a time when, whether 1782 or 1784 (authorities differ as to the year), France was in the agony of revolution. The weight of evidence is in favour of 1784, and the red fury of the preceding year in Paris may have had something to do with determining the birth-place of the future composer. We are told that he was born at Caen (January 29), his parents being then on a visit to that ancient city. It is very likely that they fled from the "Terror" to the comparative safety of the province, and thus gave to Normandy one of its most illustrious sons. But if Paris was deprived by herself of a great endowment, Auber made it up to her by becoming a Parisian of the Parisians. For him there was only one place worth living in, and he scarcely ever left it. Even in the awful days of the année terrible, when his gay Lutetia was begirt with fire and steel, and death descended into the streets as from the very heavens, Auber would not forsake the city of his affections. He remained amid the horrors of the Commune, but the fratricidal strife broke his brave and constant heart.

As in so many other instances, parental judgment mistook the destiny of the child born at Caen, and prompted measures to make of him a successful man of business. Auber began writing small pieces of music at an early age, but this indication of artistic preference does not appear to have been regarded in a serious light. At any rate, it did not prevent the father from sending his boy to England for the purpose of learning the routine of a commercial office. Possibly the youth felt all along that he would be "a round peg in a square hole," but French youth, even in those times of commotion, obeyed their parents, and Auber did his best to carry out the paternal designs. He entered a London office, and I have somewhere read that he resided for a while in Liverpool. Writing far from my books, I cannot now verify the statement; it is certain, however, that the lad made more headway towards music than in the direction of the counting-house. He went on composing, and his songs became favourably known in influential musical circles. Nevertheless, it was ordered in the council of Fate that Auber should not win his first real laurels outside his native country. When, in 1804, war again broke out between England and France, the young clerk-musician was compelled to return home. The event seems to have been accepted as conclusive against a commercial life, and Auber forthwith swore undivided allegiance to the spirit of the art which so manifestly possessed him.

The young man entered upon his Parisian career in a quiet, unpretending way. It is even said that he wrote several Concertos for a violoncellist named Lamarre, and allowed the performer to publish them under his own name. That, however, may have been the

from the boards of the Opéra Comique (1819), he bore the rebuff like a man conscious of power to succeed in the end. Succeed he did, with the third work, "La Bergère Châtelaine," and thenceforward his career (it closed with "Le Rêve d'Amour," in 1869) was one of brightness, varied only by passing clouds which cast but the lightest shadows. Auber was the musical darling of Paris during so many years because his genius bore the Parisian stamp, and, in some measure, for the reason that in Scribe he found a librettist who was as finished a Parisian as himself, and could play into his hands with all requisite deftness and certainty. To the happy matching of this pair are due the effect of mature cajolery upon youthful simplicity. Some music set to an old opera-libretto, "Julie" (1811), brought Auber into a certain measure of prominence, and led to his receiving instruction from Cherubini. Two years later, his first opera, "Le Séjour Militaire," appeared on the stage of the Feydeau, and sadly missed its mark, the failure so mortifying the composer that he remained barren for six years. That, no doubt, was a time of grace, and for once Auber's troublesome self-consciousness stood him in good stead. Shyness and want of savoir faire kept him from braving the world under the cloud of a first disappointment, but, though he suspended composition, he did not abandon study, and the results of study gradually endowed him with confidence. Hence it was that, when his second lyric drama vainly appealed to the public esprit, the piquancy, the delicate tournure of the Auber operas, in each one of which that peculiar product of nature and art, the Parisienne, might see points of resemblance to herself. The peculiar grace and charm of Auber's melodies, and the perfect harmony existing between the various elements of his music, can be more or less appreciated by all, wherefore it is very natural to wonder at the fact that the brilliant Frenchman's works are now so rarely heard in this country. Many of them have been performed here, and one, "Fra Diavolo," as we lately saw, keeps the stage. But where now are "La Muette de Portici," "Le Cheval de Bronze," "L'Ambasadrice," "Le Domino Noir," "Les Diamans de la Couronne," and others easy to name? They are, to all seeming, as water spilled upon the ground which cannot be gathered up again.

I am sometimes tempted to speculate upon the result of an Auber campaign in London at the present moment, when the master's repertory would come as perfectly fresh and new to the mass of our public. The conclusion is almost necessarily unfavourable. The very merits of Auber's operas as essentially French—nay, essentially Parisian—become defects in London, under the very different conditions and in the presence of the ill-adapted audiences to be found here. This would be the case even if French artists were alone engaged, how much more with English artists, who never make a Mendelssohn-Bartholdy was born three years after she first saw the light, November 14, 1805. Readers of the ample literature connected with the Mendelssohns are well aware that the father of Fanny Cecile and Felix cherished ideas about the education of children which were, to say the least, more exacting than prudent. He would have them know everything, and sorely tried their tender organisation with tasks which, in the case of Felix at least, possibly in that of Fanny also, led to weakened physical powers. The daughter had, of course, to study music, and brought to it the Hebrew more melancholy display than when attempting opéra comique with the stamp of the Boulevards upon it. But there is reason to believe that Auber permanently enriched the art of his own country. The French are proud of their great men, though they do not always recognise greatness at first sight, and to be one of the "glories" of that people, often styled fickle, is to occupy a position as permanent as anything in our mutable world. Ages hence, in all probability, no French Walhalla will be complete without the effigy of Daniel François Esprit Auber.

Fanny Cecile Hensel (née Mendelssohn) was the eldest child of the family into which Felix capacity so powerfully exemplified in the case of the son. She became a brilliant pianist, and, as may be gathered from various passages in her brother's letters, submitted that young gentleman's productions to the ordeal of criticism made severe rather than lenient by family relationship. Felix bore in his heart a passionate love for his sister, and set great store by her opinion; but there is reason to believe that he was just a little in fear of her. He sometimes playfully spoke of Fanny as "the Cantor"—a term chosen, perhaps, to indicate the pedagogic spirit in which she sometimes spoke, and the formality of her ideals and methods. But the pedantry, if so it may be called, of the sister possibly had a good effect upon the brother, by keeping his ardent nature, at a time when romanticism was a new "rage," within the artistic limits marked out by great masters. That she exercised some such power over him is clear, and at the period of life when Mendelssohn most felt it her influence must have been a factor in the ultimate shaping of his genius.

Fanny Hensel—she married Hensel, a Berlin painter, in 1829—had considerable powers as a composer of chamber music. A Pianoforte Trio in D was published after her death, but her strength was unequal to works of that calibre. She excelled in songs and pianoforte pieces, some of the former being good enough to appear with those of Felix as his own effusions. These are six in number—namely, Nos. 2, 3, and 12 of Op. 8, and Nos. 7, 10, and 12 of Op. 9. Among works issued with her name attached are four books of songs and Lieder for pianoforte solo, two books of songs for voice and pianoforte, "Gartenlieder," a collection of part-songs (published in England, 1878, by Messrs. Novello, Ewer and Co.), and some further pieces for the pianoforte, issued as posthumous works. To a woman of her gifts and acquirements it seems that the higher walks of composition should have been open, but she could not surmount the barrier which, whatever it be, whether lack of imagination or of application, inexorably keeps women musicians on the outer side.

Frau Hensel's death, like that of her famous brother, was sudden, and it is far from unlikely that both were due, in greater or less measure, to the same cause—overstrain of mental powers in early life. The event, which took place on May 17, 1847, was a terrible blow to Felix, whose letters with reference to it, and also his music written subsequently, breathe the very spirit of anguish. Mendelssohn felt more than a sharp but passing pain. He recognised a warning of the lamentable stroke which, six months later, deprived the musical world of a master whom it worshipped with something of personal affection as well as artistic appreciation.

W. Hensel, whose portrait appears with that of his gifted wife, was a painter of recognised merit. His career, however, lies outside the scope of these remarks, and I can only refer those who may be curious about him to an admirable book, "Die Familie Mendelssohn," of which an English translation is obtainable.

I have been studying "How to obtain a School of English Opera" (see the Nineteenth Century for July) at the feet of Mr. J. F. Rowbotham, and cannot gather from my master's utterances anything like a definite answer to the question whether the English public want such a school. This is, of course, a most important point, because if the public be indifferent further consideration of the matter would be a waste of time. I do not in the slightest degree insinuate that Mr. Rowbotham is without a clear idea of the attitude which Englishmen now take up towards a native school of opera. Were the question put plainly to him, he would, doubtless, give a precise and ready answer. But I have to do with his printed teaching on the subject, and must confess that it leaves me in a state of perplexity, seeing that I read on one page what seems to be at least unsupported by opinions legible on another. In one place, Mr. Rowbotham speaks of opera as "emphatically a marketable article" at the present time. Now, as a statement purporting to be one of fact, this is, in my opinion, entirely wrong. A marketable article is one which sells, and I know nobody in London, except Sir Augustus Harris, who would buy a lyric drama, and even he is only able to effect an occasional deal with some well-known composer because he runs an opera-house with the subscriptions of "Society," who need, or fancy they need, a public rendezvous. In how many cases, moreover, does the vendor of this marketable article pay, instead of receive, money for its production! But Mr. Rowbotham, ignorant of facts he might easily have learned, reiterates: "There is plainly a market for opera, and a very considerable one." He asserts this, observe, without any proviso as to the character, grave or gay, lively or severe, of the goods offered for sale. He speaks of opera generally, and I want to know the site of the market. Perhaps Mr. Rowbotham will tell us where he would take an opera for sale, had he one in his desk, or, to be less personal, where he would advise a friend to exhibit that class of goods.

As I read on it appears that our Reviewer's market is extremely limited in its dealings. It will have nothing to do, for example, with the "earnest" composer, whose wares are almost invariably "stiff, stagey, dull, unreal, heavy, and ineffective." After this string of fatal defects, it seems superfluous to add that they are "a very uninteresting commodity." The market is closed, also, against what Mr. Rowbotham styles "show music." By "show music" he appears to mean music produced by the composer who declines writing down to popular taste, and prefers to labour "in those higher spheres of art which were trodden by the great composers of the past." Over the portals of the Reviewer's market is inscribed, therefore, "Earnest and aspiring musicians are recommended not to waste their time within." That mart, indeed, is open, if we may believe Mr. Rowbotham, only to traders who study popular needs and do business not for glory, but for gain. So it is not much of a place after all, and comic opera alone sells. The limitation seems to me more than a little important as regards the "marketable commodity" so comprehensively indicated in the earlier part of the article. Accepting, for argument's sake, all that Mr. Rowbotham has advanced, public demand for opera in this country is confined to goods known in the trade as "light."

But is there any "hunger for opera," to use the Reviewer's expression, even of the comparatively unimportant class just mentioned? I am disposed to fancy that Mr. Rowbotham's paper was written some years ago when I read as thus: "The operas which they (the English public) go in their thousands to hear are the light French ones, whose subjects are gay, whimsical, and even frivolous." If that be so, how is it that half-a-dozen London theatres are not doing good business with "light French ones"? How is it that, with nineteen metropolitan houses open at the present moment, only one (the Standard, Shoreditch) is playing French comic opera? Practically, and despite "hunger for opera," the market is closed against that kind of work. If Mr. Rowbotham be not the Rip van Winkle of reviewers, he should know that composers of "light French ones" have had their day in this country—not that we have developed a taste for higher things, but because we have sunk to the level of nondescript and vulgar pieces, which prove the existence of a lower deep even than that touched by the maddest and flimsiest French concoction.

If the foregoing be true—and it is—how can Mr. Rowbotham speak of us as hungering and thirsting for opera? We do nothing of the kind. If we did—to put the case in another way—we should soon be satisfied; we should no longer depend for grand opera upon arrangements between Sir A. Harris and the aristocracy, and Covent Garden Theatre would be open nine months in the year instead of eleven weeks, while some other managers would be free from the need either to cater for lovers of degrading tomfoolery or shut their doors.

I am amazed to find Mr. Rowbotham laying down what he calls "a simple rule" for the guidance of composers—namely, that they should write only what has a chance of paying. He admits that the principle seems mercenary, but declares that it is good. Its merit depends, perhaps, upon the point of view, and I can only express my gratitude that the great men who have made music what it is rarely acted upon it. Had Bach kept the mercenary principle in view, how much poorer would church and chamber music now be than it actually is! Had Schubert produced only what was likely to sell, we should be destitute of almost everything bearing his name. As with these illustrious ones, so with nearly all who have conferred distinction upon their art.

Whether opera be an eminently marketable commodity, as Mr. Rowbotham thinks, or whether, as I believe, the English public are generally indifferent to its claims, let us hope that an English school will never be founded by appealing to common and vulgar tastes. Better no school at all. Figs do not grow on thistles. I close by quoting, without comment, which is unnecessary, Mr. Rowbotham's last two sentences: "But if a man humours them (the public) and humbles himself before them—in one word, induces them to take up the position of master to him—he is well off. They pay well for the gratification; and he may eventually lead them by the ear whithersoever he listeth." X.

NEW LIGHTS UPON OLD TUNES.

NO. IV.

SOME FOREIGN AIRS WHICH HAVE BECOME POPULAR IN ENGLAND.

THERE exists among what may be termed our British National airs many whose origin can be traced to a Continental source. Foreign airs without number have had a transient popularity, but only a small percentage have caught the English fancy sufficiently for them to find a permanent resting-place here.

At the present day we have a deluge of (so-called) German folk songs, which, set to English words, form the bulk of our school songs; our hymnals, too, have a strong sprinkling. I venture to think, with other writers on Folk Song, that this wholesale importation is not very desirable if we are ever to cultivate an English school of composition. It may be that the simple character of the airs (simple to inanity in some cases) makes them more adapted for rudimentary lessons in the Tonic Sol-fa notation; but it is also quite as likely that the non-existence of an English copyright, and the ease with which such melodies can be fitted with harmony, have an undue influence both on publisher and arranger. Many of the German student, soldier, and popular songs are in every point excellent; but they lose materially when second-rate English words, not even translations of the originals, are wedded to them. The air of the drinking chorus "Krambamuli" is not happy when used for the Sunday School hymn "The Mothers of Salem"; nor is "Du, du liegst mir im Herzen," at its best as "Home, home, happiest of places," or in conjunction with the many other inanities it is sacrificed on. "Der gute Kamerad" has also suffered, and a lengthy list might be easily made out. Again, the arranger has frequently not the good grace to acknowledge the "crib." Leaving this matter, it may not be uninteresting to trace the course of some last century airs which apparently obtained a stronger hold in our country than they did in their own.

The space at my disposal this month will only enable me to take two of them. The first is:—

"IN MY COTTAGE NEAR A WOOD."

We are most of us old enough to remember how this used to form the first essay of the amateur flute player. The air is terribly weak and far from exhilarating when feebly tooted by an uncertain player; but properly rendered, either on an instrument or vocally, it has a rather charming simplicity about it. Whatever be the merit of the melody, it has held for a long time an English popularity. The history of the air is generally believed to commence about a hundred years ago; but in turning over the leaves of an old French work, I find that it dates from an earlier period. The air is a simple French country Chanson, with words as simple as the tune. It appears in the first volume of a curious collection of French airs, printed at The Hague. The title of this is "Nouveau Recueil de Chansons Choiesies," 12mo. The first volume of my copy is of the third edition, and is dated 1731, but the book was originally published about 1725. The collection generally extends to six volumes, but later editions have additional ones.

At page 17, Vol. I, I find the following:

"DEDANS MON PETIT RÉDUIT."

Dedans mon petit réduit,
Je vis à mon aise;
Je n'ai qu'une table, un lit,
Un verre, une chaise;
Mais je m'en sers chaque jour
Pour caresser tour à tour,
Ma pinte et ma mie ô gué,
Ma pinte et ma mie.

There are six more verses, all expressing a like philosophical indifference and contentment.

It was some fifty or sixty years after the date of the French work quoted above before the song made its appearance in England. It is likely that a revival in France caused the air to be imported to our country, where it was possibly sung at the theatres. About 1795 Robert Birchall, the music publisher, issued a copy as "A favourite song, the words imitated from the French, by Mrs. Opie."*

The words commenced and the melody was thus—

"IN MY COT, THOUGH SMALL'S MY STORE."

In my cot, though small's my store,
I on pleasure's lap recline;
What could Fortune give me more?
Laura, beautiful Laura's mine, &c.

* Mrs. Amelia Opie was the wife of the celebrated painter, Opie. She wrote many charming songs and had much literary talent.

In spite of its being frequently named on music sheets as a "French air," it was not long before a claimant appeared as composer; for, about 1806, G. Walker, the music publisher of Great Portland Street, produced a copy with words written by himself, commencing—

In my cottage near a wood,
Love and Rosa now are mine;
Rosa, ever fair and good,
Charm me with those smiles of thine.

The air is here stated to be by R. A. Morland, which is again asserted in another place (1825). Still later (1829) it is attributed to Mazzinghi. It is amusing to note the many different sets of the words. One is—

O'er my cottage near yon wood,
Roses breathing sweet entwine;
Oh, how more than blest I should Be to call dear Julia mine!

Another—

In my cottage near the wood,
Health and plenty still combine
Me to bless with every good
That can render life divine.

"CHARLES OF SWEDEN."

We may now turn to another foreign air, this time Swedish, which has deservedly held a high place among our English popular melodies.

It was first introduced to England by a party of Swedish performers, who danced or tumbled to the tune. This can be surmised by one of its early titles, "The Swedes' Dance at the New Playhouse." The new playhouse here mentioned was most likely the newly rebuilt theatre in Lincoln's Inn Fields, commenced by the elder Rich and opened by his son in 1714. Soon after this date the tune was inserted in a small and curious work, published by Daniel Wright, as follows:—

THE NEW SWEDISH DANCE.

(From the "Musical Pocket-book." D. Wright, circa 1716.)

It was about this year (1716) that it took the name by which it was afterwards best known by reason of a song set to it in honour of Charles XII. of Sweden. Charles was a bellicose monarch, ready to fight anything or anybody, merely for the love of the thing. The Jacobite party were wishful for him to engage with them on behalf of the elder Pretender, who had just been defeated in Scotland the year previously. From the activity of the Hanoverian party, the scheme, however, fell through. The song started:—

Here's a health to the Valiant Swede,
He is not a king that man hath made,
May no oppressors him invade,
Then let this health go round.
A running bumper crown this toast,
We'll take it off whatever it cost,
A fig for those that rule the roast,
We'll ne'er in liquor drown.

And so on for four more verses. It will be found in full in Hogg's "Jacobite Relics," 1821, where it is wrongly placed with the music of the Cotillon from the "Beggar's Opera." There is strong presumptive evidence that the tune was like "The king shall enjoy his own again," used for party purposes by the Jacobite faction during and after the first Scotch rebellion. In "The Dancing Master," Vol. II., 1719, it bears the title "Frisky Jenny, or the Tenth of June." Who Frisky Jenny was I am unable to say, but the 10th of June was the birthday of the elder Pretender, and the day was celebrated in another Jacobite song put to a different air.

The melody was too good to be wholly appropriate to one party, and accordingly we find that the other side adopted it, and under the title "The glorious First of August" it is in "The Beggar's Wedding," and as "The First of August" in Wright's "Compleat Collection of Country Dances," Vol. I. (1740.) The date, the 1st of August, was that on which the Hanoverian Succession commenced by the death of Queen Anne. Politics next give place to love, for with the song-title, "The Constant Lover," it is in the third volume of the "Dancing Master," 1728. In the ballad operas, where it was much used, it retains its old title, "Charles of Sweden"; but being employed in Charles Coffey's opera, "Devil to pay" (1731), for the song, "Come, Jolly Bacchus, God of Wine," its name became again changed. After this it formed a vehicle for a naval song which chronicled the engagements of the frigate Salamander (see Dr. Kitchiner's "Sea Songs," 1823). Other naval and military triumphs were sung to the air long after it had lost its political bearing. So late even as the present century, the song, "The Neglected Soldier," was united to it. Meantime, from its Jacobite associations, the air had travelled into Scotland, and, being a capital marching tune, was at once adopted by the trade guild or company of weavers.

It was the custom in Scotland, even now preserved in some degree, to have a day appropriate to the various guilds or trades. Upon this day the craft, leaving all business behind, set forth in glorious procession, headed by a band playing the particular tune most associated with the trade. "Clout the Caldron" is the blacksmiths' or hammermen's march; "Logie o' Buchan," or "The tailor fell thro' the bed, thimbles and a'," that of the tailors. August 21 is, or was, the weavers' day, and accordingly, in Aird's first "Selection" (Glasgow, 1782), "Charles of Sweden" appears under the name "The Weavers' March or 21st of August." During its seventy years of existence the setting has altered a little, and it is now as under:—

"THE WEAVERS' MARCH OR 21ST OF AUGUST."
(From Aird's "Selection," Book 1, 1782.)

Robert Burns, familiar with the tune as belonging to the Weavers' Guild, wrote a song for "Johnson's Museum" (Vol. IV., 1792) called "The Gallant Weaver":—

Where Cart rins rowin' to the sea,
By many a flow'r and spreading tree,
There lives a lad, the lad for me,
He is a gallant weaver.
Oh, I had woovers aught or nine,
They gied me rings and ribbons fine,
And I was fear'd my heart wou'd tine,
And I gied it to the weaver, &c.

Whether the tune is now known among the Scottish weaving fraternity or not, I cannot say. The tendency of the present age to forget old songs for new forbids the supposition.

A NEGLECTED MASTERPIECE OF BEETHOVEN'S.

It is about Beethoven's "Thirty-three Variations on a Waltz by Diabelli" (Op. 120) that I now propose saying a few words, which will justify the heading I have chosen, both on the grounds that this work is a masterpiece and that of late years it has met with unmerited neglect among pianists. For myself, apart from its intrinsic worth, it has always had a kind of personal interest, arising from the fact that I first heard it played by the late Hans von Bülow—viz., on the occasion of its being heard for the first time in public at Leipzig, on March 31, 1857; and, further, from the fact that during a more than thirty years' experience of London concert-going I have not heard it played in public by any other pianist. Possibly, if not probably, it may have been brought forward by other artists during this period, but I cannot vouch for this. My recollection of hearing the work performed in public is solely and indelibly connected with the two or three occasions on which Bülow presented it at his Recitals, and a melancholy interest attaches to the fact that it figured in the programme of the very last Recital which he gave in London—viz., on June 26, 1888. Apropos of this Recital, it seems well to recall that on this occasion he furnished his auditors with a list of the titles which he had long ago devised for each Variation, and which now appeared for the first time in an English dress. The work, together with the explanatory titles which he had given to the Variations, was thus announced on the programme:—

Thirty-three Variations on a Waltz by Anton Diabelli, in C major (Op. 120). (Last Pianoforte work.) (1823.)

Theme.—Var. I. March. II. Ländler. III. Duet. IV. Terzett. V. Quartet. VI. Canonic Shake-Var. VII. Capriccio. VIII. Cantabile. IX. (Minor) War-Dance. X. Presto giocoso. XI. Contemplation. XII. Activity. XIII. Echo. XIV. Procession. XV. Scherzino. XVI. Study for the left hand. XVII. Study for the right hand. XVIII. Idyl. XIX. Canonic Scherzo. XX. Vision. XXI. Contrasts. XXII. Alla "Leporello." XXIII. Outburst. XXIV. Fughetta. XXV. Fairy Dance. XXVI. Butterflies. XXVII. Humoresque. XXVIII. Carnival. XXIX. (Minor) Mourning. XXX. (Minor) Lament. XXXI. (Minor) Elegy. XXXII. (E♭) Grand Fugue.— Transitional Cadenza, and XXXIII. Tempo di Menuetto e Coda.

A close examination of these suggested titles shows that about one-half of them was dictated by the formal contents of the Variations and the other half by their poetical intent, as it occurred to Bülow's mind. Their appropriateness will hardly be questioned.

The circumstances which immediately led to the composition of this remarkable work are not without their historical interest. During the winter of 1822-3, Anton Diabelli, composer and publisher, applied to the most eminent of Austrian composers for a set of fifty Variations on a Waltz of his own. The result was the publication in June, 1823, of two books comprising respectively thirty-three Variations by Beethoven and fifty by other composers—viz., Assmayer, Bocklet, Czapek, C. Czerny, J. Czerny, Graf Dietrichstein, Drechsler, Förster, Freystädter, Gänsbacher, Gelinek, Halm, Hoffmann, Horzalka, Hugelmann, Hummel, A. Hüttenbrenner, Kalkbrenner, Kanne, Kerzowsky, Kreutzer, Baron Lannoy, Leidesdorf, Liszt, Mayseder, Moscheles, Mosel, W. A. Mozart, Panny, Payer, Pixis, Placky, Rieger, Riotte, Roses, Schenck, Schobelechner, Schubert, Sechter, Abbé Stadler, Szlay, Tomaschek, Umlauf, Dion. Weber, Franz Weber, Winkhler, Weiss, Wittersek, and Worzischek.

Unlike his confrères, Beethoven, it will be observed, was not content to limit his powers to a single Variation, but took the matter more seriously and contributed thirty-three. Apropos of this, Miss L. Ramann, Liszt's biographer, has given us a telling anecdote which Liszt was fond of repeating. It is to the effect that a few days after receiving Diabelli's request Beethoven appeared at his door and threw in his precious manuscript, grimly exclaiming: "There! you asked me for one Variation; here are thirty-three; and now, for God's sake, leave me in peace!" Though, as far as I am aware, this story of Liszt's has not been recorded elsewhere, it seems that it may fairly be regarded as authentic from the fact that Liszt, though only a boy of eleven, was one of the contributors to the fifty Variations. As this was probably his first composition to appear in print, he doubtless at the time regarded it as a feather in his cap, and must have felt deeply interested in the essays of his fellow contributors, more especially in that of Beethoven. Except as to the term of expression, "a few days after receiving Diabelli's request"—evidently an embellishment—there seems no reason to doubt the veracity of this anecdote of Liszt's.

Schindler has told the story in a somewhat different manner, but without controverting Liszt's anecdote. He says that Beethoven, who had already been taken in in a similar manner (in the matter of contributing to several settings of "In questa tomba"), and had vowed that he never would again contribute to a "Collection," on receiving Diabelli's request at once declined it, but offered to compose a complete set of Variations. Diabelli took him at his word, but restricted him to seven Variations, for which terms were at once agreed. Beethoven at first handed him ten, then ten more, then five, and subsequently made up the number to thirty-three. It is therefore to this last occasion that Liszt's story doubtless applies.

It is not a little interesting to note that Beethoven originally intended this work for England, with a dedication to the wife of his old pupil and friend, Ferdinand Ries, then resident here and a director of our Philharmonic Society. Beethoven had commissioned Ries to negotiate for the sale of his work in London. This he did with Messrs. Boosey and Co.; but there was so much delay in transmitting the manuscript, that when at last it arrived it was found that it had already been published in Vienna and Paris, with a dedication to Madame Brentano. These facts are confirmed in a letter of Beethoven's to Ries, written from Baden, September 5, 1823. He says therein: "The Variations were not to have appeared here till after being published in London; but everything went wrong. The dedication to Madame Brentano was to be confined to Germany, I being under great obligations to her, and having nothing else to spare at the moment; indeed, Diabelli, the publisher, alone got it from me. But everything went through Schindler's hands. No man on earth was ever more contemptible: an arch villain; but I soon sent him packing! I will dedicate some other work to your wife in the place of this one."

In regard to the worth and character of this work of Beethoven's, it seems not amiss to draw upon Bülow; for, in such a matter, a more reliable guide or a more enlightened critic could hardly be found. In contradistinction to some of Beethoven's earlier critics, who regarded these Thirty-three Variations merely as a jeu d'esprit—a tour de force would have been nearer the mark—Bülow, in a prefatorial note to his instructive and critical edition of this work, has declared that "in this gigantic tone-creation he had to some extent desecrated the microcosm of Beethoven's genius in general—aye, even a picture of the entire tone-world in its progress." He goes on to say: "In this work all the evolutions of musical thought and clang-fantasy—from the loftiest sentiments to the broadest humour—are brought to light in the most eloquent manner and with an incomparable richness of variety. It furnishes an inexhaustible study, and its contents offer an unlimited sustenance to the musical brains of whole generations. Never has an author given to the world a more splendid proof of unimpaired strength—aye, even of increased creative power—at the beginning of old age. The want of attention with which it was received, and which only began to subside several decades after its publication, testifies on the one hand to the indolence of contemporary artists, and, on the other hand, to the relatively low point of culture which they had attained. In order to make this clear, it is only necessary to turn one's attention to the fifty Variations which—in aid of a charity—Diabelli, at the same period, induced several of the most eminent of German composers to furnish for his Waltz. The hardly credible depth of degradation which they manifest at once reveals the proper measure of the solitary height on which Beethoven stood." With such an apt and warm-hearted characterisation as that of Bülow's before us, what need for further detail? Those who wish to go more deeply into the matter may be referred to the article on Variations contributed by Dr. Hubert Parry to Sir George Grove's Dictionary of Music and Musicians, where they will find this work of Beethoven's pretty fully and ably discussed.

It remains but in some way to try and account for the unmerited neglect into which this remarkable masterpiece of Beethoven's, as well as his pianoforte music in general, has of late years fallen. This seems to be due partly to the apathy of pianists and partly to the preference shown by the public for music of a more sensational and less serious character. Since Bülow's death—unless we except E. d'Albert, who in Germany has of late, at a single sitting, repeatedly played Beethoven's last five Sonatas in aid of the Hamburg Bülow Memorial—there has been no pianist before the public who has made Beethoven a specialty. This may be made apparent by reference to the typical programmes of Pianoforte "Recitals" which for so long have obtained and so closely resemble one another. A typical Pianoforte "Recital" programme might fairly be defined as commencing with a work by Bach—generally consisting of one of his organ fugues transcribed for pianoforte by Liszt or Tausig—followed by a sonata of Beethoven, generally admitted as an act of duty and as a sop to the critics, but too often performed in a perfunctory manner. Then follows the real business of the day: a lengthy selection of excerpts from Chopin and Schumann, with a fantasia or rhapsody by Liszt in conclusion. Here, it might be said, is sufficient variety, were it not for the fact that almost every pianist adheres to the same kind of typical programme. The desirability of a wider infusion of variety and of a greater respect for Bach and Beethoven should therefore be strongly urged.

C. A. B.

At Leipzig, on January 2, 1894, the Peters Musical Library was formally opened to the public, Mr. Max Abraham, proprietor of the great Leipzig firm, in a short speech, explaining the nature of the new enterprise. The library has been established for the benefit of musicians in general, and students in particular. It contains works on the theory and history of music, also ancient, and especially modern music; notably, scores which can only be obtained with difficulty and at great expense. The first year's issue of the "Jahrbuch der Musikbibliothek Peters" is edited by Emil Vogel, and gives a detailed account of the volumes, which, at the close of last year, amounted to no less than 10,000, including the complete editions of Palestrina, Bach, Handel, Mozart, Schubert, Mendelssohn, Schumann, &c.; also of modern operas, full scores of Meyerbeer, Wagner, Verdi, Goldmark, Mascagni, Smetana, and Humperdinck. In the library there are, likewise, German, English, French, and Italian musical periodicals. The "Jahrbuch" also contains ten hitherto unpublished letters of Schubert, edited by Max Friedlaender, whose enthusiasm for the master is well known. The letters are of considerable interest. The first is addressed to Schubert, Spaun, Mayrhofer, and four more of the composer's Viennese friends, and it is dated September 8, 1818. The composer was writing from Zeléz, the country seat of Count Esterhazy. In 1818 Schubert was engaged as "music-master" to the family. The letter contains an account of the Esterhazy household, in which the portrait of each member, from the master down to the parlour-maid, is drawn with few, but characteristic strokes of the pen. In No. 2, addressed to Joseph von Spaun (December 7, 1822), there are interesting allusions to various compositions. Schubert speaks of his opera "des Teufels Lustschloss," which Barbaja, impresario of the Vienna Hofoper, had refused. Schubert, however, was used to disappointments of that kind; he quietly remarks that he will shortly send the score to Dresden (as Weber has written to him a letter of good promise) or to Berlin. How many attempts he made to get the work performed, we know not; but it still awaits a hearing. The third letter is again from Zeléz, but is dated almost six years later than the one mentioned above. Schubert speaks of his longing to return to Vienna in spite of a "star" attraction (trotz des anziehenden bewussten Sterns); he, too, like Beethoven, worshipped a Countess—viz., Caroline, second daughter of Count Esterhazy. In Kreissle von Hellborn's "Life of Franz Schubert," the official report is given concerning the competitors for the post of deputy Hof-Capellmeister, which became vacant in 1825, when Eibler, on Salieri's death, was appointed Hof-Capellmeister, is given. Schubert is mentioned, as having a testimonial from Salieri, and as "having composed five Masses, which have been given in several churches." But Friedlaender gives us the letter itself, addressed by Schubert to the Emperor (April 7, 1826), humbly asking to be appointed. The writer mentions therein the Salieri testimonial, the "five Masses"; and he also states "that as composer of vocal and instrumental music, he is not only favourably known in Vienna, but also throughout Germany." Whatever faults Schubert may have had, pride was certainly not one. The other letters are addressed to Nägeli, Breitkopf and Härtel, B. Schott and Co., and all relate to business matters. In letter 7, to Schott and Co., after alluding to works ready for publication, Schubert mentions "three Operas, a Mass and a Symphony, which I only name so that my aims after the highest in art may be known to you."

SIR JOHN STAINER, in his capacity of Inspector of Music in Training Colleges, makes some interesting and entertaining remarks on school songs in his report to the Education Department for 1894. The choice of school songs has always been a difficulty and a tribulation to the ordinary school teacher. On the one hand, he is tempted to the ad captandum by the desire for easy and popular display, and his natural wish to amuse and interest the children; and, on the other hand, he is beset by enthusiasts and by H.M. School Inspectors to choose "high class" music. Of late years the development of the use of music at school children's entertainments has been very extensive and has led to a great demand for suitable pieces—a "suitable" piece being, in the first place, one that will "go down" well with the children and the audience, no matter whether it is more than slightly commonplace and lucidly exemplifies the amateur in harmony and construction. Hundreds of school teachers, finding how easy it is to write words and music, provided the quality need not be considered, have turned to make their own school songs. Now we do not mean to say that none of these songs have merit, but we do say that many of them are very poor and unworthy, and that their use has tended, and is tending, to drive out better music from school use. To this feeling in high quarters must be ascribed a recent ukase from the Education Department that the "songs presented should be by recognised composers"; a well-meaning but not fortunately worded direction. It would be very difficult to say specifically who is and who is not included in this dubious category, and at one fell swoop it excludes nearly all national melodies the composers of which are not known. In the midst of this we have now got Sir John Stainer's contribution to the controversy. He recognises the difficulty of the teacher; and while warning him to avoid the choice of music of too advanced a character, recommends him not to pause to consider the nationality of a song or a composer out of regard to a false notion of patriotism. He points out that Germany and France possess many hundreds of melodies admirably adapted for school use, and he adds that while the literature of English song is replete with fine examples, a comparatively small number are suitable for school use, owing to their very extended compass and the difficulty of finding words that must necessarily be substituted for the love songs, hunting songs, drinking songs, sea songs, and those in which political satire is often "couched in unparliamentary language." Another aspect of this difficulty is seen in our article on "New Lights upon Old Tunes" in the present number. Sir John is against the issue of an authorised list. We quite agree with this opinion. Even on the low ground that such a list would either have to include existing copyrights, and thus favour monopoly, or that it would have to avoid copyright pieces and greatly limit its usefulness, it would be open to objection.

A WELL-KNOWN musician, who asks us not to publish his name, writes to propose the formation of a "Society for the Protection of Musical Compositions." He thus gives some reasons which have prompted his suggestion: "At a performance of one of Beethoven's Concertos (instrument and player shall be nameless), the tempo rubato was indulged in to such an extent that groups of four even semiquavers were continually played as a quaver followed by a triplet of semiquavers. In the pathetic phrase 'Oh! that I knew where I might find Him!' ('Elijah'), there is a crotchet rest which, rightly regarded, should produce almost the effect of a sigh on the word 'Oh!'; but it will scarcely be believed that an eminent tenor held on the initial note of the bar and carried it on to the next, entirely ignoring the rest which Mendelssohn had purposely, and with good intent, inserted. These are very bad examples for young performers and students, who think they may do such things because Madame Rubato and Mr. So-and-so set the example. That branch of the Society which would have to look after editors (Woe unto some of them!) would find a fine field for their operations. Many instances could be given of tinkering; dire; but one, which recently came under my notice, will suffice. In Mendelssohn's pianoforte piece, 'The Rivulet' (Op. 16), there is a bar of five crotchets, intentionally written, 'for better, for worse,' by the composer. Some of the editors look upon this as a 'just-cause and impediment' to the natural flow of the piece, and they coolly (rivulet like) strike out the four semiquavers forming the extra beat, and thereby reduce the bar to the regulation four crotchets. This is bad and impudent enough; but there is a still worse tinkering. A certain editor seems to have gone to work in this fashion: 'Here,' says he, 'is a bar of five crotchets, there a bar of four. Happy thought! Five and four are nine! Threes into nine will go three times, and—nothing over! Still happier thought! I'll put these two bars together, add a bar line, and insert a $\frac{3}{4}$ signature for three bars. And this is what he actually does, without any word of explanation, still less of apology! The rhythm of the piece is, of course, destroyed at this point, and students are led to think that Mendelssohn really wrote it in this particular form. Is it not time that something should be done?"

STRANGE things are done and written in the name of science. Thus we read how a statistician has recently been devoting his energies to an attempt to establish a connection between baldness and different professions. The result of these capillary investigations has been to show that musicians are better thatched than the members of any other of the liberal professions. According to his figures, only one out of a hundred composers is bald, whereas in the ranks of the honourable corporation of the goosequill, no fewer than eleven per cent. are alleged to be afflicted with denudation of the cranial surface. The accuracy of these figures can hardly be accepted with implicit trust by English readers, in view of the fact that at least three of our most successful composers form striking exceptions to the rule formulated above. We all know, again, the famous degrees of comparison recently quoted by an eminent statesman: lies, d—d lies, and statistics. But even if we make all deductions for the shortcomings of the pseudo-scientific investigator, the superior shagginess of musicians—especially instrumental musicians—as compared with other sections of the community is a matter of too common notoriety to admit of question. Fiddlers and pianists are the despair of the hair-dresser. They seldom or never subscribe to toilet clubs, conscientiously avoid the abhorred shears, and have no need for lotions and washes. Now if our statistical professor, instead of merely stating improbable percentages, had set himself to discover what are the essentially hair-producing conditions of the musical calling, he would have commanded the respectful attention of at least all the barbers in the civilised world. For our own part, we cannot help thinking that the disregard for conventional head-gear exhibited by nearly all musicians has a good deal to say to it. It is the rarest thing to see a virtuoso in a tall or hard hat, and it is well known that tall and hard hats are perhaps more than anything else conducive to baldness.

ONE may sometimes learn something even from the misstatements to be found in out-of-date musical histories, especially when one takes the trouble to verify dubious points. The following may serve as an example. Some fifty or more years ago George Hogarth, formerly musical critic of the Daily News, secretary to the Philharmonic Society, author of a history of that Society from its foundation in 1813 to its fiftieth year (1862), and of other works, published a "Life of Beethoven," based for the most part on the "Biographische Notizen über Ludwig van Beethoven," by F. G. Wegeler and Ferdinand Ries. It made its appearance in the first and second numbers of the Polytechnic Journal, and was subsequently reprinted in a separate form by Messrs. R. Cocks and Co. In its course, inter alia, we come across the following egregiously absurd and incorrect statement. Hogarth writes:—

It is to an enterprising publisher that we are indebted for the appearance of various posthumous compositions of Beethoven, particularly certain Quartets which have been lately attempted at some of the London Concerts, to the admiration of a number of our dilettanti (though the majority, we believe, found them incomprehensible); but which are now understood in Germany, by those best acquainted with the subject, to have been manufactured from scraps and fragments found in Beethoven's portfolios, and never intended by him to see the light.

It has not required much research to enable us to controvert this misstatement of Hogarth's, and lest others may be misled by him it seems worth the doing. Who was the "enterprising publisher" that he thus gratuitously libelled it is impossible to say. As a matter of fact, Beethoven's last four Quartets were originally issued by three different publishers—viz., Schott (two), Haslinger, and Schlesinger. All four were composed during the years 1824-26, and were performed in public during Beethoven's lifetime. Op. 127, in E flat, was published in 1826; Op. 130, in B flat, Op. 131, in C sharp minor, which was ready for the press in October, 1826; and Op. 132, in A minor, appeared shortly after Beethoven's death in 1827. We should greatly like to know the name of the clever individual who, according to Hogarth, "manufactured these incomparable Quartets from scraps and fragments found in Beethoven's portfolios." The accomplishment of such an impossible task would surely immortalise him!

RICHARD WAGNER recently formed the subject of a hot debate among the professors at the Paris Sorbonne, on the occasion of a certain M. Rolland presenting himself for a Doctor's degree. The custom there is for the candidate to deliver an address on some interesting and important subject, which is subsequently discussed by the professors. In the present instance M. Rolland chose for his theme the origin of Opera and its connection with Tragedy. He concluded his discourse by warmly eulogising Wagner's music-drama. In reply, M. Larroumet, Professor of French Literature, retorted by declaring that, in his opinion, Wagner the Poet was far inferior to Wagner the Musician; that Wagner was verbose and often obscure; and that he therefore preferred listening to excerpts from Wagner's works in the concert-room to sitting out his complete dramas at the opera. Thereupon M. Séailles, Professor of Philosophy and Renan's biographer, defended Wagner against these reproaches, alleging that there was an absolute congruence between Wagner the Poet and Wagner the Musician, on the ground that Wagner the Poet had discovered a style of poetic material which was eminently suited to the development both of singing and orchestration. M. Lemmonies, Professor of Art-history, supported M. Séailles, and declared himself in favour of Wagner's scheme for the reformation of opera. At the same time, he could not help looking forward to a style of music-drama which, differing from Wagner's, would be more in accordance with French taste. From this, he maintained, the present day librettists are far removed, and asserted that the inferiority of modern French opera is principally due to the incapacity of the librettists, who seem absolutely ignorant of what is required of them. There is doubtless truth in this last asseveration, but as to the Wagner question, "Who is to decide when doctors disagree?"

THE members of the committee of the Welsh National Eisteddfod are to be congratulated upon the distinct success of this year's meeting, which was held for the first time at Llanelly and was concluded on the 2nd ult. They have introduced many desirable reforms which seem to have given widespread satisfaction, and the musical adjudicators have felt themselves justified in giving much high praise to many of the performances. Sir Joseph Barnby, in delivering, on the last day of the Festival, his adjudication of the male-voice competition for choirs of sixty to eighty voices, said:—

Not being a Welshman, it is impossible for me to convey in cold English the effect made upon me by the music that I have heard during the past four days; but if there has been one moment more electrical than another it was when I heard the audience sing, and next to that I would place the singing that you have just been listening to. Why is it not more widely known? I have hitherto understood that the Germans had what I may call the copyright in male-voice singing, but I have never heard any male-voice singing abroad, nor anywhere else, to come within easy distance of the Welsh. It is not that one choir has done so much better than another, for really the four choirs are of the finest possible description; but it is, I suppose, that even in the very highest point one could reach in music there is a higher point still, and that has been just the case in the singing this afternoon. The singing of the winning choir is the finest I have ever heard in my life.

Such words from so experienced a musician in this branch of the art are high praise indeed, and they will doubtless be long remembered by the choral competitors on this occasion. Sir Joseph found also much to commend in the playing of the Pontypridd string quartet party, and all musicians will echo his hope that "it was the beginning of good things for Wales" in the matter of orchestral playing, for the foundation of love and appreciation of the highest paths of music must be laid in the home.

In this irreverent age any sign of deference is to be welcomed, and the placard abundantly exhibited at the Promenade Concerts at the Queen's Hall, requesting "silence during the performance of vocal pieces," is to be noted with gratitude. It would, however, have been more acceptable and fulfilled a more practical purpose had it requested the silence of the audience during the performance of instrumental pieces. The most inveterate talker stops, at least for a time, when any one begins to sing, not from any regard to the music, but simply because he, and may we say, or she, has been taught in early youth that it is rude to talk while anyone is speaking. The fact that the instrumentalist is speaking, or should be, through the medium of his instrument, is never dreamt of by the music-talker. To such an one music is merely a series of rhythmic sounds which have an awkward knack of suddenly becoming soft at undesirable moments. As a matter of fact, silence is more necessary for the due appreciation of instrumental than vocal music. The vocalist has the assistance of a commonly understood language to convey his meaning to the audience; the instrumentalist has only vibrations produced from wood and metal. He has a far more difficult task, and, for due appreciation of his efforts, requires a far more musically-cultured audience. Doubtless this is one reason why so much talking is heard during the performance of instrumental music.

By way of a pendant to the strange story of Mozart's skull which went the rounds of the German papers a year or so back, the Secolo gives us a not less curious or circumstantial account of the fortunes of Donizetti's headpiece. It appears that after Donizetti's death his medical attendants made an autopsy of his remains, and, conformably to their anticipations, discovered some serious lesions in the brain of the deceased composer. The brain was also of unusual weight, and indicated, in their opinion, an abnormal development of the musical and imaginative faculties. On these grounds one of the doctors was consumed with an irresistible desire to become possessed of at least part of so interesting an anatomical specimen, and accordingly, while his colleagues were not looking, slipped the cerebellum into his hat and carried off the trophy to his own house. There he kept it till his death, after which it fell into the hands of his nephew, who, unaware of its history, had it mounted as a table ornament. In some way or other—the details are not given—the municipality of Bergamo, where Donizetti was born and died, became acquainted with the story, and after instituting inquiries, recovered the missing skull in 1874. It is now, according to the Secolo, preserved in a library in Rome. The moral of this rather gruesome anecdote would seem to be that it is much safer to be a plain person than a man of genius, once the breath is out of one's body. The words of Shakespeare's epitaph are fully justified by the excesses of the anatomical enthusiast.

THE burning question of subsidising musical performances has met with a most satisfactory solution at Bridlington, a small seaside town on the Yorkshire coast. Bridlington has no chance of making a musical festival "pay its way"; the town is too small and the district too thinly populated. But, by the well directed liberality of a neighbouring amateur, the local musical society has been able to give a festival—an account of it appeared in THE MUSICAL TIMES of June last—and to prepare a balance-sheet which is made to balance by means of the significant item, "Deficit paid by Mr. Bosville . . . £93 10s. 6d." Many wealthy amateurs would do well to follow the example of Mr. Bosville's judicious generosity, though but few could be found able to imitate him in all respects. For not only does he cook the accounts in this amiable fashion, but he teaches the chorus, conducts the performances, and houses a considerable proportion of the performers. It is even whispered that, with truly Yorkshire caution, he included a local critic in his house-party, but we do not doubt that, if this were so, the liberty of the press would be vindicated by criticisms of exceptional virulence.

In the matter of disparity of remuneration, the musical profession probably shows as wide contrasts as any other calling. There is the tenor who gets (or who is said to get) £20,000 for thirty performances, and, at the other end of the scale, the pianoforte teacher with a tariff of sixpence an hour. According to a foreign contemporary there is a shop in Rome in the front of which is exhibited a placard to the following effect: "Any purchaser of more than ten francs worth of goods is entitled to two free pianoforte lessons from Professor —." In Germany, according to the German papers, the female singers just now are worse off than any other members of the musical profession. The market is overstocked and the salaries are exceedingly low. For example, it is stated that on an average not more than eight female singers are engaged every year at each of the seventy lyric theatres in Germany, and that at least thirty candidates with diplomas from the various Conservatoriums present themselves for each vacant place. As a rule, the new-comers are paid at the rate of about £6 per month, the management reserving the right to cancel the engagement in case of the singer's incompetence, while few of the leading ladies, excepting a few stars, get more than £25 a month. The condition of concert-singers is even worse. In these circumstances one is not surprised to learn that a good many artists of real talent, who might have achieved some reputation on the operatic boards, prefer to sacrifice their artistic aspirations for the certainty of a living wage which is offered them at a café-chantant.

FACTS, RUMOURS, AND REMARKS.

THE Festival of the Three Choirs being close at hand, it is timely to mention the issue of an important record connected with that venerable institution. First to act as historiographer of the Three Choir meetings was the Rev. Daniel Lysons, M.A., after whom the tale was brought down to 1864, by Mr. John Amott, organist of Gloucester Cathedral. The edition of Lysons is now very rare, while that of Amott can by no means easily be procured. Under these circumstances the need for a third edition, continuing the record to the present time, was obvious, and precisely the right men undertook to supply it. As a Gloucester organist re-edited and made additions to Lysons, so another Gloucester organist, Mr. C. Lee Williams, has re-edited and made additions to both his predecessors, with the assistance of Mr. H. Godwin Chance, M.A., whose capacity, both as a scholar and a practical man, could hardly be improved upon. The result is a handsome volume of 343 pages, enriched with views of the Cathedrals wherein the music meetings are held, and with thirty photogravure portraits of conductors, artists, and others who have been prominently connected with the Festivals. Most of these are our own contemporaries, but a few represent departed worthies, enabling us to see what kind of men, in outward seeming, were Dr. S. S. Wesley, Townshend Smith, Daniel Lysons, and William Mutlow, a Gloucester organist of repute in his day.

THE literary part of the book has been edited and written with all needful attention to the completeness of the record. This was the main object to be achieved, and the editors subjected the statements of Lysons and Amott to close supervision, correcting where needful, and excising where the matter was manifestly superfluous. In the division which represents their own authorship, Messrs. Williams and Chance have studied the continuity of the work by following the lines of their predecessors and, while not avoiding expressions of opinion, by keeping mainly to matters of fact. All the statements made may be trusted, and here, therefore, we have an eminently valuable source of information, not only with regard to the music meetings, but with reference to the artists of 150 years, the music they sang, their entrance upon and exit from the stage of the Festivals; the appearance of new works in the programmes and their disappearance, with much other that the musical student is likely to find useful. In this respect, and considering over what a space of time the history extends, the volume is unique. I may add that exploration of its pages is aided by a copious index. There should be a large demand for the work, which is published by Messrs. Chance and Bland, Gloucester.

ONE is not surprised to hear that the New Woman has given her name to a March, of which a German-American named Liesegang is the composer. I gather from the Chicago Indicator that the principal theme is charmingly melodious, and may be taken by the New Woman as a compliment, however misleading. But what will she say about the Finale, concerning which I read: "Mr. Liesegang takes a good deal of stock in the assertive qualities of the fin de siècle woman, and with a humorous intent closes his March in a way that unmistakably shows how assertive the female in question is. The effect is secured by three trombones standing up with faces to the audience and blaring out the last half-dozen bars of the score with might and main. When the encore is demanded, as it is always sure to be, three cornet players stand up and nobly aid the trombonists to force the New Woman into the ears of the audience." This may be very funny, but I quite expect to hear by next mail that Mr. Liesegang has received a deputation of New Women and that there is not much of him left.

I HAVE long anticipated a time when teachers of music will not only give lessons for nothing, but pay pupils for receiving them. An approximation to this state of things is indicated by an advertisement in a Birmingham paper: "Violin taught at 6d. per lesson; bun and a glass of milk included." I quite expect that some correspondent will enable me to show, next month, how another teacher has "gone one better"—perhaps offered to send a brougham for the pupil.

IF any doubt existed in the councils of the Leeds Festival as to the acceptableness of "The Messiah," which has a place in the programme for the first time since 1883, it is now dispelled. I hear, on good authority, that Handel's masterpiece is drawing immensely, and assured of an overflowing audience. At Gloucester, too, the old favourites are an easy first in public appreciation, the plans for "The Messiah" and "Elijah" filling rapidly.

THE query "Who was Rosetti?" which appeared in last month's "From my Study," has been answered by several correspondents, who were good enough to look the matter up. It appears that there were two musicians of the name. One, Antonio Rosetti, was born at Milan about 1744. He became an able performer upon the double-bass, and was held in esteem both as composer and orchestral leader. He published many works in the style of Haydn. The date of his death remains obscure. Francisco Antonio Rosetti, a contemporary of the preceding, is described as a Bohemian composer. He wrote an oratorio, "Der Sterbende," and, in 1750, had a second oratorio, "Jesus in Gethsemane," performed in the Royal Chapel, Berlin, by order of the then Prussian King. He composed a Requiem for the funeral of Mozart, and produced it in Prague. His death took place in 1792.

FOLLOWING is an extract from a letter which recently appeared in the Daily Chronicle:—

I am very much interested in Thomas Britton to whom you refer in your review on Tuesday of Mr. Edwards's "Musical Haunts in London." Britton was not only a musical man, but a great book collector. His library was sold by Ballard, either in 1704 or 1714—I have mislaid the exact reference. Your musical and other readers may be interested in knowing that a portrait of him will appear in "The Bookhunter in London" (page 172). At one time he was regarded as a man with a history, and a good many stories got into circulation respecting his career, but there was no truth in them.

It is said of wolves that when one of their number comes to grief in any way the others turn upon and rend him. It is said, also, that an affinity in this respect exists between wolves and musical journalists! The other day, a Chicago critic announced the arrival from Europe of Joseffy, the Hungarian pianist, and not only spelt the name wrongly, but stated that his last previous visit took place fourteen years ago. Joseffy has been a resident in the United States a very long time and has his home in New York. The mistake, therefore, was a bad one, and readers who knew better gently smiled at it. But the writer's colleagues howled with unnecessary indignation, and now the critics of the critics are saying, "We told you so."

MANY readers of THE MUSICAL TIMES will regret to learn that Mr. Lewis Thomas has been very seriously ill. His condition is now, I am happy to say, much improved, though cause for anxiety still remains. All who remember his services as a concert-singer, as well as all acquainted with his more recent labours as a musical journalist, must hope for him a complete recovery. How thoroughly his many personal friends do this need not be stated.

THE little hill village of Amberley, Gloucestershire, is becoming favoured of musical folk. The other day I met there Mr. Alfred Gibson and Mr. Henry Bird. Their talk was not concerning the Popular Concerts.

PEACEFUL sleep to Dr. Done. I had known him for thirty years, all that time occupying a position with regard to him which on certain occasions was difficult and delicate. But his cordiality never varied. He recognised duty honestly discharged, however imperfectly, and his invincible amiability did all that was further required for unbroken friendliness. Every man who knew him laments that he, in the fulness of years and completeness of honour, has passed away.

THE New York Tribune declares that the "wobble" is especially out of place in Wagner's music. Freund's Musical Weekly professes incapacity to see "why a wobble should be more out of place in Wagner's music than in any other." The matter might be developed into a very pretty quarrel.

I HAVE just read that Jean de Reszke's Carlsbad physician "shipped him off to Poland." Shakespeare was right after all, and Bohemia has a sea coast.

THE Chicago Indicator has some excellent and timely remarks upon the impatience of musical pupils. I extract a paragraph for such foolish young people to ponder over:—

You may have the finest piano that money can buy; you may have the talent of Paderewski; you may have the greatest teacher; but of what avail are all these things if one thing is lacking unto you, and that is earnestness? Earnestness is the key-note of success. If you have not the capacity for real, genuine, earnest work, and if your surroundings will not enable you to do such work, the best that you can do is to close the lid of your piano, keep flowers and bric-a-brac upon it, and then shall it be a thing of beauty and a joy for ever; then shall your neighbours rise up and call you blessed; then shall the American girl and her piano be a national affliction no longer.

EMPEROR WILLIAM is said to be taking lessons on the flute. Well, that is harmless, at any rate, and possibly soothing.

THE grand old man among pianists is Chevalier de Kotski, who, though eighty years of age, is giving successful Concerts in Japan, where he shows himself "still youthful in soul and as full of sunshine as an acre of iris." Amateurs of long standing in this country can hardly have forgotten De Kotski or his popular show-piece called, if I rightly remember, the "Awaking of the Lion." He was then thought to be an extravagant artist: at present he ranks among the comparatively sedate.

JOSEPH BENNETT.

ROYAL OPERA, COVENT GARDEN.

THE opera season closed, on July 29, with an "extra" performance of "Romeo et Juliette," given before a crowded and brilliant audience that included the Prince and Princess of Wales and other members of the Royal Family. During the evening Sir Augustus Harris came on the stage, and, in presence of the whole company, asked Madame Melba to present a handsome bâton to Signor Mancinelli in recognition of his indefatigable efforts during this and the previous seasons. A similar gift was bestowed on Signor Bevnigni, but this presentation was made in private. Mr. Neil Forsyth, Sir Augustus Harris's assistant-manager, was entertained at supper on the previous Saturday by the musical critics. Mr. Hermann Klein presided, and, on behalf of his colleagues, presented Mr. Forsyth with a gold cigarette case, as a token of their appreciation of his courtesy in the fulfilment of duties that often required the exercise of a maximum of tact. The guests included M. Maurel, who was so kind as to sing several times during the evening. He was accompanied by Mr. Landon Ronald. The opera season thus pleasantly brought to an end has, we are glad to hear, been one of the most successful under the present management. As only one new work was produced—Mr. Cowen's "Harold"—students of the conditions under which opera may hope to prosper are compelled to draw inferences not altogether favourable to the progress of art, in so far at least as this means the encouragement of operatic composition.

QUEEN'S HALL PROMENADE CONCERTS.

IT is customary for superior people to sneer at Promenade Concerts as having no beneficial influence on musical art, but if these worthy folk would study the musical history of London with an unbiased mind they would alter their opinions. In the days of Alfred Mellon and his immediate successors it was impossible for amateurs of scanty means to hear a symphony or a concerto except at entertainments of this description. True, some caterers of late years have deemed it well to consult the tastes of the vulgar, and have reaped a deserved reward in failure. But Mr. Robert Newman, the admirable manager of the Queen's Hall, is rightly of opinion that a large section of the public is prepared to accept something better than the "British Army" Quadrille or the "See-Saw" Waltz. The palatial establishment in Langham Place is thoroughly well adapted for the purpose to which it is being put at present, and the special decorations, consisting of towering palms at the sides and back of the orchestra, and a cool fountain surrounded by huge blocks of ice in the centre of the promenade, together with the general arrangements for the comfort of visitors, testify at once to the astuteness and the good taste of the management. We, however, are more intimately concerned with the programme and the manner of performance. On the opening night, the 10th ult., the conditions were not altogether satisfactory. The adoption of the French pitch in the Queen's Hall should meet with the warm approval of all right-thinking musicians, but it is quite likely that it disconcerted some members of the orchestra at first. Then it was generally felt that the strings were somewhat feeble, and they have since been reinforced, greatly to the enhancement of the effect. In Mr. Henry J. Wood a highly intelligent and experienced conductor has been secured, and he now has his forces well under control. Although conductors are said to be born, not made, occasion is an important factor in their development. These Concerts have proved to be Mr. Wood's opportunity, and have served to show that he possesses exceptional abilities. Among the pieces in the first programme were Wagner's Overture to "Rienzi," Liszt's fourth Hungarian Rhapsody, and some interesting and curious chromatic Waltzes by Cyril Kistler, from his comic opera "Eulenspiegel." The vocalists were Madame Duma, Mrs. Van der Veer Green, Mr. Iver McKay, Mr. Peterkin, and Mr. Ffrangcon Davies.

Music of a somewhat higher class than on other nights has been given so far on Wednesdays, the principal features on the 14th ult. being Beethoven's rarely heard Overture to "King Stephen" and Schubert's "Unfinished" Symphony in B minor. More attractive was the scheme on the following Wednesday, Schubert's "Rosamunde" Overture, excerpts from the second and third acts of "Lohengrin," and Mendelssohn's "Italian" Symphony being capitally interpreted. Two interesting pieces were marked "first time in England"—one was a melodious and voluptuous meditation from Massenet's opera "Thaïs," and the other Rimsky-Korsakoff's Overture to an opera, "La Nuit de Mai," a work noteworthy for the strongly marked, rugged rhythm almost invariably found in Muscovite music. Analytical and historical notes are contributed to the programmes by Mr. Edgar F. Jacques.

SIR JOHN STAINER'S REPORT ON MUSIC IN ENGLISH AND WELSH TRAINING COLLEGES.

SIR JOHN STAINER's report to the Education Department on music in English and Welsh Training Colleges in 1894 has just been issued. The following are extracts (the full text will be found in The School Music Review for September):—

"We have always considered the proper rendering of a song an important portion of our examination, as giving us an opportunity of discovering the presence of taste and feeling in the singer, qualities not, of course, to be found out by the various technical tests to which each student is put. For many years there has been a steady improvement, not only in the class of songs sung to us, but also in the manner in which the songs are rendered.

"The culture of the higher musical sentiment must inevitably leave its mark on the character and the rendering of music chosen by students for use in elementary schools when they become teachers."

"There can be no doubt that the selection of proper music for school use is a task of considerable difficulty. Until recently the supply was more or less limited, and certainly much of it was of an inferior quality; teachers were almost forced to teach a good deal of very poor music set to equally poor words. . . . But there is now no lack of supply of good and suitable music for schools, a large literature of such songs has lately come into existence, and it is becoming daily more extensive. It is clearly, then, the duty of teachers to pay special attention to this subject.

"There is, of course, the possible danger that in making an effort to improve the type of school songs, our teachers may select music of a too advanced character.

"In making choice of school songs a teacher should not pause to consider the nationality of the song or its composer; both Germany and France possess many hundreds of simple and beautiful tunes admirably adapted to school use, and it would be the most foolish of the many existing false notions of patriotism to exclude such songs or even to use them sparingly.

"Though the literature of English national songs is remarkably extensive and replete with fine examples, a close study of them proves that comparatively only a small number are suitable for school use. This arises from various causes, of which only a few need be stated. It is well known to teachers that school songs should not have a very extended compass. When a large number of children are singing together there must necessarily be among them many who cannot sing very high and many also who cannot sing very low. It is most important that the voices of such children should not be "strained" in either direction; songs of a medium compass are therefore a necessity. But, unfortunately, it is one of the characteristics of many of our old English songs that their range is often excessive, very commonly an octave and four notes, frequently a twelfth, and I have noted a large number which actually extend to a compass of thirteen notes.

"But even if old songs of a suitable vocal compass are selected, we still have to face the difficulty of finding new sets of words for the old tunes, new linings for these cherished old garments, owing to the fact that so many are aimed at political events of their period, events of which an ordinary school child has now no knowledge and in which he can take no interest, and, also, because their keen and often clever satire is couched in the most unparliamentary language.

"A large and very beautiful group of our songs were merely vehicles for the interchange of (the usual) compliments between the everlasting Phillis and Damon or Chloe and Corydon. But many of these have been revived in a form suitable to children. A vast number of our national songs are devoted to the subject of hunting. It is not quite in my province to give an opinion on this matter, but I should think that fox hunting is not a subject on which it is advisable to concentrate children's thoughts, even if the methods of the sport had remained unchanged. But they have changed: I am no sportsman myself, but I am not aware that hunting men are now roused out of bed at daybreak by the blowing of horns under their windows or that they return after an enjoyable run to sit down to dinner at twelve o'clock. With regard to the drinking songs, of course temperance words might be set to them, as has been done with some of our old English glees, but the result always sounds to me rather incongruous. Even the sea songs have to some extent grown out of date, a large number of terms and the expressions grouped round them, which were familiar to sailors on wooden sailing ships, would be quite unintelligible to a man on board one of our ironclads. I suppose even the well-worn phrase: "Hearts of oak" will eventually have to be converted into "Plates of steel."

"But a considerable amount of interest has been lately taken in the preservation of our national songs, and I have no doubt our editors and publishers will bear in mind the needs of our little school children for simple melodies with good straightforward words.

"I do not think it would be wise to issue, from time to time, an authorised list of songs to be used in schools, or even to be prepared for the musical examination of Her Majesty's Inspectors. The inconvenience and the difficulties of such a course are obvious to anyone acquainted with our school system. But if our teachers will give this subject the attention it deserves, and will exercise a wise discretion in the selection of school songs, if they will treasure the old without distrusting the new, the children under their charge will take much more interest in their lessons and derive much more benefit from them."

The detailed reports of the visits of Sir John Stainer and Mr. W. G. McNaught to the sixty training colleges under Government inspection show that a very high standard of musical execution is often attained, especially in choral performance. Lincoln College, where Mr. E. Dunkerton (one of the lay-clerks of the Cathedral) teaches, heads the list by gaining ninety-nine per cent. of the marks assigned for practical work. Admirable performances are recorded of such difficult works as Wagner's "Holy Supper" (Chester), Schubert's eight-part Psalm, for men's voices, "The Soul of Man" (St. Mark's, Chelsea). In all thirty-four cantatas and oratorios were performed.

THE MARSCHNER CENTENARY.

THE birth centenary of Heinrich Marschner was celebrated last month at the leading German theatres, and at Vienna, by gala performances of his principal operatic works, while especial commemoration of the event is to take place in the course of the present month at his native Zittau. Marschner was one of the chief representatives of German romantic opera, sharing the distinction with Carl Maria von Weber and Spohr. But while the lyrical stage works of the composer of "Jessonda" and of "Faust" have, from intrinsic causes, fallen into almost entire neglect, and have exercised no perceptible influence upon the progress of the art, the contrary has been the case with those of his two brother composers. Weber's "Der Freischütz" appears to be evergreen, and his "Euryanthe" is meeting with far more appreciation to-day than it did during the composer's lifetime, and for many years after. The reason for this partly is, because we recognise in them the germs and the forecast of the important modern development of the "romantic opera" into the music-drama of Richard Wagner. In the same way, though in a minor degree, the operas of Marschner may be said to have influenced this development, and at least his finest and most characteristic work, "Hans Heiling," more and more appreciated by his countrymen of late years, is likely to survive for some generations to come.

The composer was born at Zittau, in Saxony, on August 16, 1795. His predilection for music, which the father encouraged, led him to the study of the art from an early age, and when as a student of the law at Leipzig University he went through a course of instruction with the cantor of St. Thomas's, Schicht, it scarcely needed the persuasive arguments of that worthy musician to convince him that the law was not his vocation. Devoting himself henceforth entirely to his musical studies, he accepted an invitation of Count Thaddeus von Amadée to a prolonged sojourn, in 1817, at the latter's residence in Hungary, where he composed his first opera, "Der Kyffhaeuser Berg," and on which occasion also he made the acquaintance of Beethoven, in Vienna. In the following year Marschner sent the newly finished score of his opera, "Heinrich IV. und Aubigné," to C. M. von Weber, in Dresden, through whose benevolent influence the work was produced here in the following year, and well received; a fact which determined him in taking up his residence in the Saxon capital. Here the intercourse with the composer of "Der Freischütz," who encouraged the younger musician in every way, could not fail to produce a profound impression upon the latter, and which has left its distinct mark upon his subsequent productions. The most important of these are "Der Vampyr" (first produced at Leipzig in 1828), in which the demonic element, after the example set by "Der Freischütz," predominates; "Der Tempier und die Jüdin," founded upon Walter Scott's "Ivanhoe" (first brought out in 1820, also at Leipzig), a picturesque and highly dramatic work in part, but suffering from a weak libretto; and finally "Hans Heiling," his masterpiece, a work replete with the glow of romanticism, combining, as it were, the best qualities of the two former works, but which was somewhat coldly received by the critical pens on its first performance in 1833, at Hanover and Berlin. In addition to these still popular operatic works, Marschner has established a claim to the recognition of his countrymen by numerous vocal quartets and songs, many of which have remained favourites with choral societies and private circles.

During his stay at Dresden Marschner had been appointed assistant-capellmeister to Weber and Morlacchi. After the death of the former, in 1826, he became conductor of the Leipzig Stadt-Theater, and in 1831 accepted the first capellmeistership at the Royal Opera in Hanover, from which position he retired in 1859. He died on December 14, 1861, at that town, where a monument was soon after erected to him in front of the theatre which had been for so many years the scene of his artistic activity. To most English amateurs of the present generation, Marschner is but a name. In the earlier part of the century, however, his "Der Vampyr" proved a great attraction, having a run of sixty nights at the English Opera House (Lyceum) in 1829, and being frequently produced for some years afterwards. An intended visit, by invitation, of the composer to this country, for the purpose of conducting some of his works, in 1830, was unfortunately frustrated by the burning down of Covent Garden Theatre.

"THE FROGS" OF ARISTOPHANES AT LEATHERHEAD.

A MOST satisfactory performance of Aristophanes' "Frogs," with Dr. Hubert Parry's music, was given by the boys of St. John's School, Leatherhead, on July 29. The Gymnasium had been turned into a temporary theatre for the occasion, and the audience, numbering about 400, included a good proportion of prominent musicians and critics. A professional orchestra, conducted by Mr. R. R. Terry, rendered the somewhat difficult accompaniments with excellent effect, save in a few instances where a want of rehearsal was apparent. The whole of the rest of the performers were boys of the school, who entered with energy into their work. The chorus especially, with their graceful dancing and spirited singing, were—it is not too much to say—surprisingly good. Of the actors, Mr. L. E. Start, as Dionysos, displayed dramatic powers seldom to be found in an amateur. The other parts—especially Xanthias (Mr. L. Bevin), Heraclès and Æacus (both undertaken by Mr. G. L. Bradley)—showed careful training, and were played with a vigour and "go" which was exhilarating. The whole performance was remarkable for the ease and smoothness of both acting and singing, and the St. John's boys are to be congratulated on a display of musical ability highly creditable to themselves and to their school. The scenery (designed by one of the masters, Mr. H. B. Wagreen) was appropriate and tasteful. The work of training actors and chorus, and the staging of the entire play, devolved on Mr. R. R. Terry, who has every reason to be satisfied with the result of his efforts.

REVIEWS.

Borodin and Liszt. By Alfred Habets. Translated, with a Preface, by Rosa Newmarch.

[Digby, Long and Co.]

THERE are so few English books from which music-lovers can gain acquaintance with Russian composers and their works, that this volume is very welcome. It is somewhat sketchy in character, and omits much that would be of interest to the musician; but as an introduction to modern Russian musical art the book has distinct value. Most readers will be chiefly attracted by the preface, which gives a brief but fairly comprehensive history of the rise of the new Russian school. The information is largely drawn from Cui's "La Musique en Russie," who, with Balakireff, may be regarded as having laid the foundations of contemporary Russian music. The principles formulated by these composers, the chief characteristics of their compositions and those of their fellow-workers, Rimsky-Korsakoff, Moussorgsky, Borodin, and others, are briefly described, and an interesting picture drawn of the peculiar conditions under which these composers laboured. So small has been the market for musical productions in Russia, that only men possessing private means could devote their lives exclusively to art. Thus Cui was a general in the Army, Rimsky-Korsakoff started life in the Navy, and Borodin became a celebrated professor of chemistry. The sketch of Borodin's life is brightly written, and contains interesting references to his principal works. For the benefit of the many amateurs to whom it is to be feared even the name of Borodin is scarcely known, it may be mentioned that these works comprise an opera in four acts, entitled "Prince Igor," two Symphonies (respectively in E flat and B minor), a symphonic sketch, "Dans les Steppes de l'Asie Centrale," two quartets, and several pieces of smaller dimensions but great artistic value. In his letters occur many amusing passages relating to the difficulties under which he laboured as a composer. In a letter dated June 10, 1876, he writes: "One needs time to concentrate oneself, to get into the right key, otherwise the creation of a sustained work is impossible. For this I have only a part of the summer at my disposal. In the winter I can only compose when I am ill and have to give up my lectures and my laboratory. So, my friends, reversing the usual custom, never say to me 'I hope you are well,' but 'I hope you are ill.' At Christmas I had influenza and could not go to the laboratory. I stayed at home and wrote the Thanksgiving Chorus in the last act of 'Igor.'" In another letter he writes: "In fact, when I am tied to the house with some indisposition, unable to devote myself to my ordinary work, when my head is splitting, my eyes running, and I have to blow my nose every minute, then I give myself up to composing." From this it must be admitted that Borodin, in the pursuit of his art, struggled against difficulties of no mean order. The letters to his wife in 1877, concerning his interviews with Liszt at Weimar, contain many passages which draw graphic pictures of the conditions under which Liszt was living at that time. The pictures are not always flattering to the Master, and although Borodin acknowledged the extraordinary personal influence of the Abbé, he seems to have been doubtful of its healthiness, since in one letter, referring to his reception at Weimar, he says: "Already it is all fading like a dream. One might compare it to the scene of the Venusberg in 'Tannhäuser' with Liszt in the part of Venus. As yet, I remain under the spell."

Novello's Part-Song Book. Nos. 727-737.

IN nearly all districts of the United Kingdom choral concerts are now suspended, but they will be resumed in the autumn, and meanwhile the publication of part-music continues in scarcely diminished volume. The first of the above-mentioned series is by B. Luad Selby, and has the uninviting title of "The Hag," the words being from the pen of R. Herrick. It is a vigorous and picturesque composition, with a very effective accompaniment. No. 728, "Stay, sweet day," by George Garrett, is much simpler, but within four pages of music the tempo is changed several times, after the manner of some eighteenth century anthem and service writers. Shakespeare's lines, "Who is Sylvia?" have been set many times, and the latest version, by Edward German (No. 729), may rank among the best of those written for voices in harmony. Without being difficult it is very expressive, and would be more effective without than with accompaniment. No. 730, "The Shepherd's Waking," by Eaton Fanning, is a setting of lines from John Attey's "First Book of Airs," 1622. The sensuous words have been appropriately set, and the part-song is an artistic mingling of the musical seventeenth and the nineteenth century styles of part-song composition. Everybody knows Herrick's verses "Cherry ripe," and the setting, by S. P. Waddington, in six-voice parts (No. 731), is bright and full of musically touches. It is wisely stated that the pianoforte accompaniment is for practice only. In No. 732, "Mary Morison," by George H. Ely, Robert Burns's well-known lines have received quiet musical illustration, not remarkable in any way, but generally pleasing. No. 733 is a so-called "Villotta" by Baldassare Donato (1550), a hymn-like little piece with Italian words. We next come to another example of sixteenth century Italian music, "Chi la Gagliarda" (by the same composer), edited by Barclay Squire (No. 734). It is a characteristic specimen of the time, and might rank with Festa's still popular "Down in a flowery vale." "Soft, soft wind," words by Kingsley, from "The Water-Babies," music by J. R. Deer, No. 735, is a very tasteful part-song, somewhat Spohr-like in its harmonic progressions, but not by any means difficult. No. 736, words from Robert Jones's "First Book of Songs and Airs" (1601), music by F. Cunningham Woods, "Lie down, poor heart," could not possibly pass for a composition of the Elizabethan period, for some of the harmonies are distinctly of the present century; but the music is suitably plaintive in feeling and quite easy. Yet one more Elizabethan part-song. No. 737 is "How sweet the moonlight sleeps," being an illustration, by D. Emyln Evans, of Shakespeare's familiar lines. Here there is no attempt at imitating archaic phraseology, the little piece being written in a flowing style and in its melodic and harmonic progressions being suggestive of Mendelssohn and Spohr.

Berthold Damcke, Etude biographique et musicale.
[Paris: Alphonse Lemerre.]

IN this admirably printed volume we read of a musician of whom little is known in England, excepting that he was an intense admirer of Berlioz, and also one of the French master's most intimate friends. In Part 1 the story of his life is told; but, as is mostly the case with musicians, it has little of general interest. Like Berlioz, having "fixé son but au dessus du médiocre," Damcke found the art of living by no means easy. The writer of the book, Prince Alexandre Bibesco, is no great admirer of Mendelssohn, either as man or artist; in one place, referring to that composer's dislike to "Robert le Diable," he remarks that the latter work "surviva longtemps aux pauvretés esthétiques du jeune Bartholdy." There are interesting pictures of Berlioz, and of other illustrious musicians who took part in the soirées intimes of the Rue Mansart, evidently drawn from life. Part 2 deals with Damcke's music. As a composer he was not prolific; and, so far as we can read between the lines, his works, excellent in their way, show signs of study rather than inspiration. Part 3 is devoted to the artist as a critic, and our writer places him in the first rank of "critiques-compositeurs." Two extracts, by way of specimen, are given from the Journal de Saint-Petersbourg, to which Damcke was a frequent contributor. In the one Rubinstein as a composer is discussed, and the judgments expressed are sound; the other contains Damcke's musical credo—viz., that la beauté idéale should be the aim of all composers. The remark is true enough: and yet of little practical use so long as musicians are not agreed as to what is, and what is not beautiful. Damcke sums up Wagner thus:—"Convictions factices, contradictions perpétuelles, infatuation de jongleur mal satisfaite: c'est là le vrai fond de Richard Wagner"; though, it should be added, that he regarded the master's musical organisation as "de premier ordre." Damcke's ardent friendship for Berlioz will account, to some extent, for his hostility to Wagner.

First Steps at the Pianoforte. By Francesco Berger.
[Novello, Ewer and Co.]

MR. FRANCESCO BERGER has prepared an excellent book for little folks, which has the special merit of teaching by visual associations. The value of learning by objective perception cannot be over-estimated. It is nature's method, and with children it is of paramount importance. Mr. Berger's book is distinctly the best introduction to the pianoforte and the Staff Notation at present extant, and if its methods and rules are faithfully followed it cannot fail to produce satisfactory results. Mr. Berger teaches the treble and bass staves separately, building up each line by line, the treble being taken first. The hands are treated in similar manner; the right hand, and subsequently the left, and finally both simultaneously, being used in progressions occurring in the upper part of the instrument. The study of the bass clef is delayed until some progress has been made in the time value of notes and even time signatures. This method has much that is commendable, and doubtless it has been well tested by Mr. Berger's experience as a teacher. It certainly has the merit of lending itself to clear mental classification, a desirable feature in all studies.

The Human Voice: its Mechanism and Phenomena. By Anatole Piltan. [Robert Cocks and Co.]

MR. PILTAN'S book has a scientific value which demands specific notice. This gentleman, with the laudable aim of reducing the respiratory movements of vocalists to scientific exactitude, has devised an apparatus which records, in the shape of a series of sympathetic curves on a revolving cylinder, the movements of the inspiratory and expiratory muscles and the pressure of air in various parts of the throat and head. With the zeal of an enthusiast the author has, by this means, tabulated every action in which the lungs take part from the groan to the sneeze. Broadly speaking, Mr. Piltan's deductions may be said to confirm what has been so ably shown in Dr. Joal's valuable book "On Respiration in Singing"—namely, that the best results are to be obtained from expansion of the lower part of the chest according to what is known as the costal method. Mr. Piltan, however, pursues his theory of the control of the breath being the source of all good vocal tone to the extent of throwing doubt upon the commonly accepted theory of the vibratory action of the vocal cords. He says: "The vocal cords must only be taken into account because they impede and, at the same time, regulate the air. Besides, it is not necessary that the vocal cords, which are stiffened by contraction, should vibrate like the reed of an organ pipe; we can see that there are many other ways of producing tone, and even though the vibratory reed determines the pitch, it is not the tongue or reed which is the sonorous element in any case—it is the air." The true theory of the action of the vocal cords is, however, of little moment to the singer, for, apart from the movement of approximation, they are not under his immediate control. The diagrams of the vocal shake would seem to show that the true shake is not the result of the rapid and direct alternation of two notes, but "a kind of beat resulting from the emission of two distinct shades of vowels for the two notes which constitute the shake." As this discovery seems to have been the result of observation, and as Mr. Piltan says, "I always get satisfactory results with this teaching," the matter will doubtless occupy the attention of many teachers. Mr. Piltan would have been wiser had he left the matter of "pronunciation for English singers" alone. The vocalist who for "totter he will not" sang "tawter he weal naught" in any English concert-room would give rise to "audible smiles." Some compromise in the pronunciation of the vowels may be tolerated when they occur in positions of exceptional difficulty, but obviously one of the chief aims of voice cultivation is to enable the singer to pronounce, as far as possible, all the vowels in all parts of his voice; and the sacrifice of clear articulation to produce a fuller tone is one of the besetting sins of vocalists. English audiences want to hear the words, and on the clearness with which they do so greatly depends their esteem of the singer. The method of question and answer which Mr. Piltan has adopted, and of which the former is so obviously dictated by the latter, and the want of terseness in the language are also regrettable, not to say exasperating features of his book; but although sometimes it takes long to get at the author's meaning, the time will be found well spent by all to whom the much vexed question of voice production is important.

A Night in Spring. In Autumn Woods. Songs. English words by Paul England. Music by Eric Meyer-Helmund.
Little Laughing Yeau. Song. Words by James Lumsden. Music by G. Henschel.

[Stanley Lucas, Weber and Co.]

THE first of these songs well sustains the reputation of the composer. The gentle melancholy of the text and tender longing for the presence of an absent one are admirably reflected in the music, which is graceful and expressive. The omission of a sharp before the C in the accompaniment in the first bar of page 4 is likely to prove disastrous to players at first sight. "In Autumn Woods" is less distinctive than the foregoing, and its melancholy is of a hopeless kind. The music is simple and unpretentious. Mr. Henschel's song is a sprightly ditty, but the accompaniment seems somewhat heavy and laboured for so light a subject.

Novello's Parish Choir Book. Nos. 199-210.
[Novello, Ewer and Co.]

A VERY large addition has been made to this series since our last notice. The first of the present series is a setting in C of the Benedicite, by John E. West. It is simplicity itself, consisting of two chants in the customary triple time and a Gloria in duple measure. No. 200 is a brief and unpretentious anthem, "The Sower went forth sowing," by J. Barnby, but within its limits as musically and expressive as possible. The next is a partly harmonised and partly unisonal Magnificat and Nunc dimittis in the Gregorian style, by J. Stainer. The familiar Palm-Sunday hymn, "All glory, laud, and honour," is effectively set in what may be termed free hymn form by Arthur H. Brown. This is No. 202, and the next is the Nicene Creed from Berthold Tours's justly popular Service in F, in its harmonised form. No. 204 is another setting of the same Creed in D, by J. W. Elliott, very bold and vigorous, and noteworthy for striking harmonic progressions, though not otherwise elaborate. The same composer's Benedicite, No. 205, consists of four chants variously harmonised and effectively contrasted. No. 206 is a somewhat ambitious Magnificat and Nunc dimittis in A by Myles B. Foster, suitable for festival occasions, and requiring to be sung and accompanied with energy and confidence. The next two numbers consist of the Te Deum and Jubilate by Clement R. Gale, and similar remarks will apply to these. If parish choirs are now capable of doing justice to such musical versions of the Canticles, we must have considerably advanced since the bad old days of the "duet service" between parson and clerk. No. 209 is a Magnificat and Nunc dimittis in C by Eaton Fanning, brilliant and somewhat elaborate, with some excellently written fugal passages. The last is another Benedicite, in E flat, by T. R. Matthews, consisting of the usual number of chants in triple and duple measure. Here we must conclude for the present, but many more numbers await notice.

Biblische Lieder. With Pianoforte Accompaniment. Op. 99. Book I. By Anton Dvorák. [Berlin: N. Simrock.]

THESE remarkable songs, five in number, should be acquired by every cultured contralto vocalist, to whom they are the most suitable. The text is given in three languages, German, English, and Bohemian. The delicacy of the accents of the latter tongue has necessitated an additional staff for the voice part of the Bohemian text, and the difference between this and the voice part provided for the German and English words is a peculiar feature of the work. Not only do many strongly accented notes become weak, and vice versa, in the German and English voice part, but the composer's keenness of perception has sometimes led him to make important changes in the rhythm of certain phrases. The care thus bestowed upon the agreement between the words and music greatly heightens the artistic value of the songs, and will, doubtless, be a cause of satisfaction to those vocalists who are unable to sing them in Bohemian, in which language they would seem, judging from the thoroughly Slavonic style of the music, to have been originally set by the composer. The English text consists of paraphrases of certain verses, mostly familiar, of the Psalms; but the music is utterly unlike what is commonly met with in songs based upon these poems. The spirit of the words is expressed in a graphic rather than what is accepted as a devotional manner, and the harmonic changes are bold and regardless of conventional procedures. The setting of "I will sing new songs of gladness" partakes largely of the nature of a spirited folk-song which, however, is concluded by a Finale finely expressive of the exuberant triumph of the text. A setting of "Hear my prayer" naturally attracts attention. It opens with a broad and dignified phrase of great beauty, and a fine effect is secured on the word "hearken" by an harmonic change from the key of D flat to that of F sharp minor. In contrast to the descriptive pianoforte part and the restless tonality of this song is the setting of "God is my Shepherd," the accompaniment of the five opening bars of which consists of a single note, repeated three times. Enough has been said, however, to awaken the interest of musicians.

Text Book on the Natural Use of the Voice. By George E. Thorp and William Nicholl. [Robert Cocks and Co.]

IN a brief introduction to this work the authors write: "We make no apology for placing before students of singing another book on the use of the voice. We believe in controlling the breath by the use of the false vocal cords," and in chapter four they further state that "although some vocalists believe in the theory of registers, we do not." It is scarcely necessary to say that these opinions are the opposite to those held by the majority of accepted authorities on voice-training; but whether the theories of Messrs. Thorp and Nicholl are right or wrong, they have the merit of being explicitly set forth. A welcome feature in modern works on singing is the attention given to the important matter of articulation, and in this particular Messrs. Thorp and Nicholl's book contains many excellent explanations and directions. The exercises given in the chapters on "Balance of language and tone" and "Vowel formation" are well calculated to effect their purpose, and can scarcely fail to prove beneficial to the intelligent vocalist. The chapter on the pronunciation of consonants is equally good; and the book concludes with some excellent advice to students and insistence upon the important fact that "In order to become a successful artist one not only needs a good voice, but also artistic feeling and musical ability."

Church Music for Harvest-tide.
[Novello, Ewer and Co.]

WE have before us several anthems from Novello's Octavo series, specially suitable for the Harvest Festivals which will shortly take place. No. 503, "All Thy works shall praise Thee," by George H. Ely, is suave and flowing rather than brilliant in style, but finishes with a dignified chorale. No solo voices are required. No. 517, "Great and marvellous," by J. Frederick Bridge, opens with a broad and dignified chorus in A, ending with an effective transition to the dominant of F, in which key there is a melodious four-part verse. The final chorus is brief and appropriately jubilant in character. No. 519, "I will open rivers," by Edgar Pettman, commences with a short bass solo, leading to a somewhat extended and brightly written though simple churchlike chorus. No. 520, "O give thanks," by Bruce Steane, is a bold and expressive little anthem, mostly choral, but containing a little duet for treble voices. It ends with a majestic chorale. No. 521, "Praise my soul," by the Rev. E. V. Hall, is a setting of a familiar hymn, and is appropriately solid and hymnlike in character, within the means of any village choir. The last, No. 629 (Musical Times), is "The eyes of all wait on Thee," by Alfred R. Gaul. It is written throughout in this graceful composer's most tuneful style, the most pleasing section being a little movement in the pastoral style (9-8 time) which might have been more prolonged.

We have also the "Harvest Festival Book," consisting of Tallis's Preces and Responses, the Canticles and special Psalms with chants, many of which are new; and four new hymn tunes, two by Sir Joseph Barnby and one each by Sir John Stainer and Mr. John E. West, all cheerful and hearty in tone. The little book is issued in a convenient form and should save choirmasters much trouble in the selection of the music for these autumnal celebrations.

Four Songs. Written and composed by Paul Umlauf.
[Novello, Ewer and Co.]

THE sentiments of these songs may be gathered from their respective titles, which are "Devotion," "Remembrance," "Rejoice, sad heart," and "Farewell." The music is essentially modern in character, and sometimes the striving for expression is more apparent than successful; but much charm pertains to the first, and the third is an impassioned setting, which, well sung, would be effective in the concert-room. They belong to a class of song, now happily meeting with increasing favour, in which the music is not only made entirely subservient to the demands of the text, but also enforces its poetical significance. The union of sense and sound is in this case the more complete owing to the lyrics having been written by the composer, who thus may be accredited with perfect acquaintance with their inner meaning. An excellent English translation of the German is provided, and finished vocalists would do well to add these songs to their repertory.

THE TIMES.

A most interesting and praiseworthy composition. . . . The management of the main theme of the whole work, a plaintive descending phrase of four notes, is exceedingly clever, and the character of the words has been exactly caught throughout. The contrast, at the words "Sing us one of the songs of Zion," between the harsh utterances of the Assyrians and the foregoing lament of the Israelites, is admirable. . . . The closing section, "O daughter of Babylon," is most beautiful, and, in spite of occasional reminiscences both of Brahms's "Requiem" and of various choral works by Parry, the composition has claims to high consideration.

MORNING POST.

There is a great deal of merit in this work, which denotes the hand of a skilled musician. The voice parts are well laid out, and the orchestral treatment is good. . . . Altogether the composition shows great promise.

DAILY NEWS.

Mr. Macpherson has wisely avoided the essentially Scottish characteristics, which are now becoming more or less overdone; and although there are indications of the influence of Mendelssohn, with traces here and there of the ecclesiastical style, and of the mannerisms of Dvorák, the Psalm is a well-devised and well-balanced work, thoroughly in keeping with the spirit of the text, and with orchestration which is never overdone, and which is always effective. The first two verses are of course more or less in a sorrowful strain, but the music is worked up at the vigorous demand: "Sing us one of the Songs of Zion"—to which the broad melody of "How shall we sing the Lord's song in a strange land?" comes as an excellent contrast. There is again a capital point gained after the imposing "Down with it even to the ground," when, the violins being muted, the wailing Andante, "O daughter of Babylon," softly led off by the ladies' voices, enters with truly beautiful effect. The last number is a fugue, which, however, is broken off for a repetition of a portion of the opening, "By the waters of Babylon," the Psalm thus ending as sorrowfully as it began.

GLOBE.

Mr. Charles Macpherson's setting of the 137th Psalm, "By the Waters of Babylon," is a work of real originality and power. It is constructed on an elaborate scale, but though the various sections are developed at some length, there is very little tendency to diffuseness. The work is written throughout for chorus and orchestra, but though the composer denies himself the relief afforded by solo voices, he has cleverly avoided any suggestion of monotony by frequent changes of rhythm and varied orchestral colouring. . . . for the most part his work is sane and vigorous, and his feeling for dramatic effect is undeniable. It would not be difficult to point out traces of the influence of Brahms in certain passages, and occasionally there is a reminiscence of Dr. Parry's massive choral style, but the young composer has plenty of ideas of his own, and treats them like a thorough musician.

DAILY CHRONICLE.

From beginning to end there is nothing trivial or commonplace in the score either with respect to the four-part choral writing or the orchestration. In both elements the merits of the work are such as to warrant the composer being placed among the few younger musicians of the time from whom a really important and valuable contribution to musical art may be reasonably expected.

CHURCH TIMES.

"By the Waters of Babylon," Psalm 137, set to music for chorus and orchestra, by Charles Macpherson, is a fine work with much originality of treatment. Essentially modern in harmonisation, it is nevertheless intensely reverent in feeling, and portrays in an admirable manner all the varied feelings expressed in the verses of the Psalmist. Nothing can be more plaintive and beautiful than the melancholy wailing complaint of the opening chorus, led off by the sopranos and altos, and answered eight bars farther on with the same subject by the tenors and basses. This is greatly heightened in effect by the chromatic independent accompaniment. Very dramatic is the next movement, "Sing us one of the songs of Zion," full of effective, taunting harmonies. The next verse, "How shall we sing the Lord's song," led off by a touchingly beautiful subject in unison, afterwards expanded, is followed by a bright reply, "If I forget thee," in C major. Farther on is a grand and pompous chorus, "Remember the children of Edom," very dignified and effective throughout, and specially noticeable at the words "Down with it." There is some fine fugal treatment afterwards in the last chorus, "Blessed shall he be," to which the tremolando accompaniment towards the close contributes great dignity. After a brief instrumental portion of twenty-six bars, a section of the opening verse is re-introduced, bringing this admirable work to a reposeful ending. Choral societies will thank us for introducing this original and worthy composition to their notice.

MANCHESTER GUARDIAN.

It is pre-eminently an earnest and a thoughtful work, the effort of a young student of harmony whose subtle instincts enable him to penetrate far beyond the narrow limits and feeble guidance of our regulation class-books, and whose fancy is keen enough to carry him into regions where danger besets the bold navigator of sounds. The very mistakes of such a man are interesting and instructive, for they are evidences of unfettered thought and of an ambition which, although it may easily lead astray, has a hopeful vigour and virility, and ought ultimately to guide the persevering student to a chastened style, at least free from the commonplace utterance of commonplace ideas. In the work before us the power of the author is, as might be expected, exhibited more distinctly in the setting of the denunciatory phrases than in the more placid episodes, although the lament of the opening verses of the Psalm is poignantly and very impressively expressed. Of the orchestration we can judge only from a perusal of the compressed score, but of its power and independence we have high expectation.

LONDON & NEW YORK: NOVELLO, EWER AND CO.

Organ Arrangements. Edited by George C. Martin. Nos. 24-36. [Novello, Ewer and Co.]

NOTWITHSTANDING the enormous increase in the volume of original compositions for the organ of late years, especially in this country, there is still evidently a strong demand for arrangements, and we have in the present instalment of Dr. Martin's series several selections from the works of the great masters which we do not remember to have seen before in the form of transcriptions for the "king of instruments." For example, No. 24 consists of that marvellously original and beautiful Andante con moto in A minor, from Schubert's last and greatest Symphony in C (No. 9). No. 25 is Handel's Overture to the "Ode on St. Cecilia's Day" and No. 26 the Larghetto in E flat from Schumann's Symphony in B flat (No. 1). No. 27 consists of two little pieces, Schumann's "Warum" and Henselt's "Liebeslied," both of which are well suited to the organ. In No. 28 we have a delightful Adagio sostenuto in C from Haydn's Quartet in G (Op. 76, No. 1). Adolph Hesse's music is not much played now-a-days, but those who do not know the bright and spirited Fugue in E flat which forms No. 29 should make its acquaintance. No. 30 is a characteristic Andante in C minor, from a rarely-played String Quartet of Spohr. No. 31 is the lovely Andante in A from Mozart's familiar Quartet in D, and No. 32 an extremely vigorous Fugue in C major by Albrechtsberger. Antiquarian music also forms the contents of No. 33, which are a Minuet in G from Bach's first Violoncello Suite and a Gavotte in E minor by Veracini. No. 34 is the Adagio in D from Mozart's Clarinet Concerto, and No. 35 Rossini's "La Carità," both of which have been previously arranged. The last number for the present is a Toccata in A minor by Purcell, well worthy of the great composer. As regards the transcriptions, No. 24 is by Arthur B. Plant, No. 25 by C. Macpherson, Nos. 26-35 by A. W. Marchant, and No. 36 by H. Davan Wetton.

And there was war in heaven. Anthem for St. Michael's Day. By H. C. Perrin.

[Office of the Organist and Choirmaster.]

THIS ANTHEM is to be first performed at the quin-centenary Service to St. Michael's, Coventry, on the 29th inst. It is a somewhat noteworthy composition, showing clearly that Mr. Perrin has no idea of being governed by tradition in Anglican service music, but is prepared to adopt modern methods with faith and heartiness. The words, taken from Revelations and Hymns Ancient and Modern, are set to strikingly effective music, the elaborate organ accompaniment suggesting the idea that Mr. Perrin must have been thinking of the orchestra when he wrote it. But the vocal parts are no less fresh and vigorous, the final movement, of a fugal nature, showing the hand of a naturally gifted and well-trained musician.

Fifteen Celebrated Marches. Arranged for the Organ by W. T. Best. [Novello, Ewer and Co.]

IT WOULD be late in the day to sing the praises of the gifted organist so long associated with St. George's Hall, Liverpool, for his skill in making transcriptions for his instrument from the scores of the great masters, and it will suffice to call attention to the contents of the present volume. They include such familiar marches as Beethoven's from the Sonata in A flat (Op. 26), Chopin's Marche Funèbre from the Sonata in B flat minor (Op. 35), Handel's Dead Marches from "Samson" and "Saul" and the March from "Scipio," Mendelssohn's "Cornelius," "Wedding," and "War" Marches, Meyerbeer's from "Le Prophète," and lesser known examples by Schubert and other composers. The volume should prove very useful to organists.

Elegy on the Death of a Poodle. Posthumous Song. By Ludwig van Beethoven. [Novello, Ewer and Co.]

THIS SONG, which, after the lapse of about a hundred years, is now published for the first time, is founded on a manuscript in the possession of Dr. Erich Prieger, of Bonn, who believes it to have been composed at about the same date as "Adelaide," though Nottebohm places it somewhat earlier. The present version has English words only, which have been translated from the original German by the Rev. John Troutbeck. The song is in two sections—the first consisting of three verses in F minor (Mesto), the second of an Andante in the tonic major, of a more cheerful cast. Melody and harmony of both sections, though not, perhaps, on the master's highest level, are yet in a high degree beautiful and expressive, and, as regards style, could have been written only by Beethoven or, perhaps, Haydn. The song makes no exceptional demands upon either singer or accompanist. It should be added, to avoid possible misunderstanding, that both words and music treat the death of this particular "friend of man" in a spirit of reverence.

Scènes Villageoises (Op. 50). For Violin and Pianoforte. By Emile Sauret.

Nocturne in D (Op. 18). For Violin and Pianoforte. By Leo Stern.

Fête au Village, Morceau facile (Op. 6). By Charles Duret.

[Stanley Lucas, Weber and Co.]

THE first of the above consists of four pieces, of which number one, entitled "Le matin," now under notice, is a good example of M. Sauret's melodious and graceful style. The pianoforte part is neatly written and occupies an honoured place. Mr. Stern's "Nocturne" is appropriately dreamy and pleasing in character, and as it makes but moderate demands on the player's executive abilities will doubtless be welcomed by many amateur violinists. Mr. Duret's piece is bright, gay, and simple, and is suitable to young players.

Short Settings of the Communion Service. Nos. 31, 32, and 33. [Novello, Ewer and Co.]

THE composition of music for Church use is ever on the increase, young musicians recognising the extraordinary demand that has sprung up in the present generation. It is perhaps scarcely necessary to repeat that the present settings of the Eucharistic Office include the Benedictus and Agnus Dei, now so much in use in the Church of England. The first of the series to hand is by P. E. Hughes. It is vigorous, melodious, and generally effective, the only fault being that the composer has occasionally placed the accent on the wrong word, particularly in the Nicene Creed. In the clause "Being of one substance," a stress should be laid on "one." More careful in this respect is Mr. G. M. Livett, who contributes a Service in G. This is simpler in structure, is written in "short score," and is very devotional in character. No. 33, in C, is by T. Leslie Carpenter. It is a very bright and effective Service, and is more elaborate than the others, containing parts for solo voices and musicianly fugal writing.

Quatre Pièces Caractéristiques. Pour Violoncelle seul. By Félix Battanchon.

Précieuse Gavotte. Pour Violon et Piano. By C. Franchi. [Paris: Richault et Cie.]

THE four pieces for solo violoncello consist of Caprice, "Un enterrement en Carnaval," "Coup de vent," and Barcarolle, and violoncellists of average executive abilities will be able to make them pleasing and effective. The B flat should be A flat in bar eight of the principal subject of the Allegro scherzando of the Caprice.

The Gavotte is a sprightly example of this dance form, and should require but little practice for its adequate interpretation.

Danse Tyrolienne. For Violin, with Pianoforte Accompaniment. Op. 12. By A. Simonetti. [G. Ricordi and Co.]

M. SIMONETTI has written a characteristic dance, which may be recommended to the attention of violinists in search of an effective but moderately difficult piece.

Novello's Short Anthems. Nos. 54, 55, and 56.

[Novello, Ewer and Co.]

THE first of these, by Charles Wood, "I will arise," founded on words from the parable of "The Prodigal Son," is a singularly expressive little piece, considering that it is comprised within three pages. The accompaniment shows the hand of an accomplished musician, and the close, for bass voices only, is deeply pathetic. No. 55, "The Angel of the Lord," by Alan Gray, is for St. Michael's Day or general use, and is pleasing, though it does not possess any special characteristics to which attention should be directed. The last for the present is "Jesu, Saviour, I am Thine," by Bruce Steane, for Holy Week. It commences with a suave and flowing solo for soprano or tenor, and concludes with a simple chorale which should be sung unaccompanied, if possible, for the sake of effect.

Novello's Octavo Edition of Two-part Songs for Female Voices. Nos. 92-97. [Novello, Ewer and Co.]

The whole of these are by that talented musician, Myles B. Foster. The first of the series, "Fairy Workmen," is very charming and more elaborate than the second, "Phœbus," and the third, "Get up," though these are written in an equally elegant style. The last-named might pass for a barcarolle and is specially suitable for juvenile choirs. No. 95, "A Fairy Fancy," is a genial and tuneful piece, sure to please young or adult lady vocalists. More sedate in character is the next, "Do your very best," intended doubtless for schoolgirl singers. The last for the present is "Lined with gold," a graceful little piece in 9-8 time. It should be stated that these little compositions are not written solely in thirds and sixths, but are vocally interesting, though of course not difficult. The refined words are from the pen of Somerville Gibney.

FOREIGN NOTES.

ANTWERP.—The "Antwerp Muzickschool," under the direction of the gifted Flemish composer, Peter Benoit, has just been raised, by Royal decree, to the position of a Royal Flemish Conservatorium, with the important government grant accompanying such title. There are now five similar State-subsidised institutions in Belgium—viz., at Brussels, Liège, Ghent, Bergen, and Antwerp.

BAYREUTH.—Herr Max Bauernfeld, of the Bremen Stadt-Theater, has been engaged by Frau Cosima Wagner for the part of Siegfried at next year's performances of the "Nibelungen" Tetralogy.

BERGAMO.—At the instigation of the representatives of the Johann Simon Mayr Institution, a commemorative tablet has just been placed against the house inhabited for many years by Alessandro Nini, at his native place, Tano, where also he died in 1880. Nini was the composer of a number of operas, more or less successful in their day, and was the successor of Mayr in the directorship of the Bergamo Institution.

BERLIN.—The Royal Opera, which has temporarily established itself at the Kroll'sche Theater, pending important structural alterations of its proper quarters, resumed its performances, on the 1st ult., with Nicolaï's "Die lustigen Weiber von Windsor," conducted by Herr Weingartner. A three-act opera, "Der Lootse" ("Le Pilote"), the libretto by Armand Silvestre and Aristide Handrey, was recently brought out with considerable success at the Flora-Theater, in the Charlottenburg district. The composer (who conducted) is Herr Urich, a creole (native of Trinidad), and a pupil of Gounod.—Signor Mascagni's new one-act opera "Il Viandante" ("Der Wanderer" in the German version) is to be first brought out at the forthcoming season of Italian Opera at the Theater unter den Linden. The libretto is founded upon Coppé's comedy "Le Passant." Samara's "La Martire" is also to be produced here, with Signora Frandin in the titular part.—Dr. Oscar Fleischer, the custodian of ancient musical instruments at the Royal Museum, and hitherto private lecturer at the University of Berlin, has been appointed to the professorship of musical history at that alma mater, in succession to the late Professor Spitta.—A new ballet, entitled "Laurin," by Moritz Moszkowski, is in course of being mounted at the Royal Opera.—The following gentlemen have been nominated members of the jury in the Rubinstein Prize Competition—viz., Professor Schroeder, of Sondershausen; Professor Jadassohn, of Leipzig; Herr Starke, of Breslau; Herr M. Pohl, of Mannheim; M. A. Silioti, of Antwerp; and Professors Breslau, Ehrlich, Dorn, Kleinmichel, Ph. Scharwenka, and Job. Schulze, of Berlin.

BOLOGNA.—The Baruzzi Prize for the composition of an opera has been awarded by the jury, presided over by Signor Giuseppe Martucci, director of the Liceo, to Signor Giacomo Orefice, for a lyrical comedy, entitled "Consuelo." The libretto, from the pen of the composer, is founded upon an episode in the celebrated novel by Georges Sand.

BRUSSELS.—The season of opera at the Théâtre de la Monnaie, which opens next month, will bring some interesting novelties, including M. Massenet's "Thais," M. Xavier Leroux's "Evangeline"; an opera, "Ferval," by M. Vincent d'Indy, and the late B. Goddard's "La Vivandière," with Madame Armand in the titular part. Beethoven's "Fidelio," with M. Gevaert's recitatives, is also to be given during the season.

BUDAPEST.—M. Arthur Nikisch has resigned his position of conductor of the Royal Opera, the result of a long-standing disagreement with his directors. The ready acceptance by the authorities of M. Nikisch's resignation has caused some little sensation in musical circles of Austria-Hungary.

BUENOS AYRES.—A new opera, entitled "Taruss-Bulba," has been brought out recently at the permanent Italian Theatre here, and has met with much success. The composer is the Maestro Arturo Berutti.

DRESDEN.—Herr Julius Schulhoff, the well-known pianist and composer, celebrated his seventieth birthday on the 2nd ult., at his residence, Ober-Loschwitz, near Dresden.—A new opera, "Die Macht der Liebe," by the Danish composer, Herr Schjelderup, is to be shortly brought out at the Royal Opera, where also Herr Eugen d'Albert's "Ghismonda" and Herr Max Schillings's "Ingwilde" are in course of being mounted.—We gather from the annual report of the Royal Conservatorium just to hand that the total number of pupils at this excellent Institution, during the past academical year, was 902, including many foreigners.

GLOGAU.—Herr Julius Lorenz, the esteemed director of the Sing-Akademie, has been appointed, under very acceptable conditions, to the conductorship of the Arion Choral Society of New York and of Newark, New Jersey.

HEILBRONN.—The first performance of a remarkable new oratorio, "Christus der Auferstandene" (Christ Risen), took place here recently, in the Church of St. Kilian, by the Sing-Kranz, under the direction of Herr L. Schmutzler. The composer is Herr Gustav Schreck, the present cantor of St. Thomas's Church, Leipzig, and the work is considered by competent critics to be one of the best of its kind produced in Germany for some years past.

KLAGENFURT.—The fiftieth birth-anniversary of the popular composer, Thomas Koschat, was celebrated here last month by the Kaerntner Sängerbund and other choral societies, and amidst general rejoicings of the populace. The proceedings culminated in a Volksfest, held in the vicinity of the town, in which over ten thousand people took part. Similar demonstrations took place recently at Vienna and elsewhere in Austria, where the composer's songs enjoy an immense popularity.

LEGHORN.—Signor Mascagni's opera "Silvano," revised and in part re-written by its composer, has just been produced here and has met with a far more favourable reception than that accorded it at Milan and Naples. The libretto, which is the work of Signor Targioni Tozzetti, is a kind of pendant to that of "Cavalleria Rusticana." Signora Gemma Bellincioni sang the part of Milide and Signor Stagno that of Silvano. There was a full house and the composer, who conducted the performance, was called before the footlights many times.

LEIPZIG.—The opera "Bei Sedan," the first part of the duology entitled "In the year 1870," by the patriotic Herr Heinrich Zöllner, is to be brought out with, it is said, magnificent scenic accessories this month at the Stadt-Theater.—Professor Carl Reinecke has now definitely resigned the conductorship of the Gewandhaus Concerts, which he has held for so many years. The important artistic appointment, which carries with it a stipend of £1,000, has been offered to and accepted by M. Arthur Nikisch.

LISBON.—"Don Quichote e Sancho Pança," a Portuguese adaptation of M. Sardou's play by Senhor Eduardo Garrido, with some sprightly and characteristic music, chiefly choral and concerted numbers, by Senhor Luiz Filgueiras, was brought out recently at the Theatre Dona Amelia and was very well received. — Senhor Augusto Machado, the composer of "Laureana," has completed the score of a new opera, "Mario Wether," an idyl in two acts, for which Signor Leoncavallo, of "I Pagliacci" fame, has furnished the libretto. The gifted Portuguese composer, with characteristic industry, has already taken in hand another operatic work, the subject of which is borrowed from the well known novel by Eça de Queiroz; "O crime do padre Amaro."

LUDWIGSHAFEN.—The ninth annual Musical Festival of the Palatinate, which took place here on July 21 and 22, was a highly successful gathering. Some twelve hundred vocalists took part in the performances, which included as principal features Heinrich Zöllner's cantata "Columbus" and Reinhold Becker's "Vor der Schlacht," conducted by their respective composers and greatly appreciated by a numerous audience. César Thomson, the only instrumental soloist, met with an enthusiastic reception.

MADRID.—A cycle of Wagner's music-dramas will be given at the Royal Opera early in the coming season. M. Ibos, who created the part of Werther in Massenet's opera at the Paris Opéra Comique, has been engaged for the parts of Lohengrin and Walther Stolzing in "Die Meistersinger." — The new opera "Der Lootse," by Herr Ulrich, referred to elsewhere, with a Spanish version of the libretto, is to be shortly brought out at the Eslava Theatre.

MARIENBAD.—At a charitable Concert given here last month, Mlle. Pauline Metternich, the daughter of Princess Metternich, made her début in public as a violinist in pieces by W. Bach and Néruda, and created a highly favourable impression. Herr Alfred Grünfeld, the eminent pianist, was the accompanist.

MEININGEN.—A Thuringian Musical Festival is to be held in this town from the 27th to the 29th inst., under the protectorate of the Duke, when Bach's "St. Matthew" Passion, Beethoven's Missa solemnis, and Brahms's "Triumph-Lied" will be the principal pieces in the programme. Professor Joachim, with his quartet party, and Eugene d'Albert will likewise take part in the proceedings. Herr Steinbach, the Meiningen Musik-director, will be the conductor.

MILAN.—Signor Spiro Samara, the composer of "La Martire," has completed a new three-act opera, "La Furia Domata," a version of Shakespeare's "Taming of the Shrew," which is to be brought out at La Scala in the coming season. Signor Leoncavallo's new opera, based upon Murger's "La vie de Bohème," and Signor Gianetti's "Madonnetta," founded upon a drama by Boito, are likewise to be first produced here.

PARMA.—The remains of Paganini have lately been exhumed at the Communal Cemetery in this town, for the purpose of removal to a more prominent site. It is stated that the features of the great violinist are still remarkably well preserved.

PRAGUE.—An interesting revival was presented at the National Theatre last month in the opera "Dratenik" (The Wire-worker), by Franz Skroup, the reputed founder of the national Czech opera and composer of the patriotic hymn "Kde domou můj" (Where is my fatherland?). The opera, first produced in 1826, met with a full measure of appreciation on its present revival.

ROHRAU.—The monument erected years since to Joseph Haydn in this, his native place, has just been transferred to a more accessible position, with attendant ceremonies, in which several Austrian musical societies took part.

ROME.—The eightieth anniversary of the first performance on any stage of Rossini's "Il Barbiere" is to be signalled in February next by special performances of the work both here and elsewhere in Italy. The celebrated chef d'œuvre was first brought out at the Argentina Theatre, Rome, on February 5, 1816, and it was not until four-and-a-half years' later—viz., on September 16, 1820—that it made its appearance at La Scala, of Milan.—Signor Franchetti, the composer of "Asraël," has just completed a new operatic work, "Maria d'Egitto," which will probably be first produced in Florence.—An opera, in three acts, "Ermingarda," has been accepted for performance here during the coming season. The composer is Signor Renato Brogi, a student at the Milan Conservatorio, and the principal male part in the work is to be taken by the composer's uncle, the tenor, Augusto Brogi.—Verdi, notwithstanding his advanced age, has been busily at work lately, and besides setting to music several hymns to the Virgin Mary, to words by Arrigo Boito, has just put the finishing touches to a grand mass in honour of the seventh centenary of St. Anthony of Padua.

SALZBURG.—In aid of the building fund of the Protestant church in this town, and under the patronage of the Princess Marie of Saxe-Meiningen, Miss Fanny Davies gave a Concert a few days since in the Royal Palace at Berchtesgaden. The famous clarinetist, Herr Muhlfeld, took part, and, besides joining Miss Davies in one of Brahms's new sonatas, performed a composition for clarinet by the Princess Marie herself. Miss Davies also played pieces by Schumann and Liszt, and vocal numbers were contributed by a son of the once celebrated basso, Staudigl.

SPA.—Marix Loevensohn, the young violoncellist who recently played at St. James's Hall, appeared here on the 7th ult. The public, usually cold, was roused to enthusiasm, and the critics were unanimous in praise of his excellent execution, as well as his intelligent and impressive interpretation.

UTRECHT.—M. Richard Hol, one of the most highly-valued composers of Holland, celebrated, on July 23 last, his seventieth birthday, and was the recipient of numerous tokens of esteem from all parts of the country. M. Hol is equally distinguished as a pianist, orchestral director, and conductor of choral societies, and his four-part songs, more especially, have achieved great popularity. The very ably conducted Weekbald voor Muziek, of Amsterdam, devotes an entire number to the event, with contributions, literary or musical, from many representative Dutch musicians.

VENICE.—Signorina Pia Böhm, a pupil of the Conservatoire, has composed a scene entitled "Spes ultima Dea," which was much applauded when performed at the yearly concert of pupils. The music of the little scene shows great dramatic effect.

VIENNA.—Johann Strauss has finished the score of a new operetta, "Waldmeister," which will be brought out at the Theater an der Wien next winter.—Dr. Guido Adler, of Prague, has been appointed to the chair of Musical Aesthetics at the Viennese University, lately vacated by Dr. Hanslick, the distinguished musical critic.—The Imperial Opera, which re-opened its doors after the vacation last month, has just recorded the 200th performance of Meyerbeer's "L'Africaine." Quite a sensation was created by the recent assumption by a young vocalist, Fräulein Paula Mark, of the part of Carmen in Bizet's opera. Equally successful has been the appearance of Herr Hesch, of the Hamburg Stadt-Theater, as Leporello, which has led to the engagement here for three years of this excellent artist, who it is hoped will be a worthy successor to Carl Mayerhofer.—The ceremony of unveiling the Mozart monument, which was to have taken place here next month, has had to be postponed until April next year.

WEIMAR.—Professor Carl Hummel, the eminent German landscape painter, youngest and last surviving son of Johann Nepomuk Hummel, the famous composer, celebrated his golden wedding here on the 14th ult. Both he and his charming wife, upon whom the weight of years sits very lightly, were the recipients of numerous tokens of affection and regard from their friends and fellow citizens, the Grand Duke at their head.—A monument, erected at the initiative of the Grand Duke of Saxe-Weimar, to Johann Nepomuk Hummel was unveiled last month in the gardens adjoining the Hof-Theater, at which Institution the composer occupied the post of capellmeister from 1820 until his death in 1837.—Herr Stavenhagen has now been definitely appointed to the first capellmeistership at the Hof-Theater, with leave of absence from his post during part of the year, to enable him to continue his activity as a pianist.—The Liszt Museum here has just received a most interesting addition in a beautiful plaster-cast of the great pianist's right hand, taken on the occasion of his birthday in 1874, and hitherto in the possession of Frau Jessie Hildebrand, of Florence, who recently presented it to the Grand Duke.—In a pamphlet just published, and entitled "Ein Vierteljahr Capellmeister," Herr Eugene d'Albert relates his experiences during his brief conductorship at the Hof-Theater.

MUSIC IN BIRMINGHAM.

(FROM OUR OWN CORRESPONDENT.)

THE Committee of the Birmingham Festival Choral Society have presented their forty-ninth annual Report to the members, which, taking all things into consideration, must be accepted as satisfactory.

The financial result of the year shows a net profit on Concerts of £32 16s.; but owing to the very heavy sick and funeral expenditure, amounting to £185 12s. 1d., as against £153 19s. 1d. of last year, the balance-sheet shows a deficit of £34 12s. 9d.

Taking a retrospective view of the work done in the past year, which included the preparations for the Triennial Festival, and the actual Festival itself, I find that three Concerts only were given during the season, and the works represented were "The Golden Legend," selection from "Tannhäuser," Dr. Parry's "King Saul" (composed expressly for the Festival of 1894), "As the hart pants" (Mendelssohn), Te Deum (Berlioz), and "The Swan and the Skylark" (Goring Thomas). Mention, however, should also be made of the usual Christmas performance of "The Messiah." The total attendance of the public at these Concerts was 7,898.

The Report also deals with the resignation of Mr. Stockley, as Conductor and Chorusmaster of the Society, an office held by him for an unbroken period of forty years, with the greatest honour to himself and untold good to the Society. Due reference is also made to the appointment of Dr. C. Swinnerton Heap as Mr. Stockley's successor, who now comes to the Society as a ripened and distinguished musician, with large and varied experience as a conductor, and with credentials of the very highest order.

Of special interest is the suggested Concert scheme for 1895-6, which by rights should find great favour with the subscribers and the public in general. The works to be produced will be Gounod's "Redemption," Berlioz's "Faust," the third act of "Lohengrin," the Prelude and Prize Song from "Die Meistersinger," "Black Knight" (Elgar), "Lotos Eaters" (Parry), and "St. Francis," by Tinel.

Mr. Stockley is already to the fore with an announcement of his usual series of four Orchestral Concerts to be given during the season. The works to be submitted are of a varied and representative character, including several novelties. At present the outline of the programme stands as follows: Beethoven's "Pastoral" Symphony, Schubert's "Unfinished" Symphony, Bizet's "Suite l'Arlesienne," Brahms's Symphony in E minor; Overtures: "Hänsel and Gretel," "Sakuntala" (Goldmark), "Meistersinger," "Fingal's Cave," "Oberon," "Coriolanus"; Violin Concerto (Hollander), "Il Lamento" (Hollander), conducted by the composer; Vorspiel, "Tristan and Isolde"; Elegy (Tschaiakowsky); Vorspiel, "Lohengrin"; "Huldigung's March" (Wagner); Notturmo, "Midsummer Night's Dream," and "Saltarello" (Gounod).

Messrs. Harrison have not yet issued their programme for the season, but I hear that Madame Patti will again head the list of prime donne.

Mr. Max Mossel, a Dutch violin virtuoso, who has lately settled in our city, has been appointed on the teaching staff of the Midland Institute School of Music as professor of the violin. The new-comer was leader for some time of the "Kes" Orchestra at Amsterdam, and is a pupil of Csillag, the great Hungarian professor. The principal characteristics of his playing are a refined style and a highly artistic temperament.

A just tribute has been paid to our City Organist, Mr. C. W. Perkins, by the musical critic of La Fédération Artistique, issued at Brussels, who was present at Mr. Perkins's last Organ Recital, given at our Town Hall in July last. A notice in that paper contains a brief description of the Town Hall organ, also a valued account of Mr. Perkins's wonderful command over the king of instruments, and concludes with an expressed hope that Mr. Perkins may see his way clear to visit the Continent, where he is sure to meet with a hearty welcome.

The free Organ Recitals, by the way, which have attracted a great many people to the Town Hall, are discontinued during the vacations, and will again be resumed on Wednesday, the 4th inst.

The hitherto successful Musical Matinées in connection with the Royal Society of Artists will be continued during the autumn Exhibition, under Mr. Oscar Pollack's direction.

MUSIC IN EAST ANGLIA.

SUNDAY music in open spaces has been introduced in Norwich by the Corporation, that body having given permission to several bands connected with different manufactories to play a selection of sacred (?) music in Chapel Field Gardens on Sunday afternoons during the summer. The movement has been most successful, and the large numbers present on each occasion have behaved with commendable decorum.

The next interim Concert of the Festival Choral Society is fixed to take place on Thursday evening, December 5, when Mendelssohn's "Athalie" will be produced. Miss Teresa Blamy will sing the principal soprano part, and the important spoken part will be declaimed by Mr. Charles Fry, who will make his first appearance in Norwich.

Dr. Bunnett's Concerts in the Pier Assembly Rooms, Lowestoft, are becoming quite celebrated for first performances of operettas, the latest addition being one composed by Albert Henning, entitled "Tom's Choice," which was produced on the 15th ult. Lasting but a short half-hour, the plot is necessarily slight, and need not be described. Suffice it to say it proved very amusing. The music is decidedly above the average of such compositions; several of the numbers are bright and tuneful, and not commonplace. The parts were filled by Mr. Henning (the composer), Miss Lilian Redfern, and Miss Jessie Browning, the latter lady personating a prim up-to-date governess with much spirit and musical ability.

The Church Congress, which meets at Norwich in October next, will be interesting to musicians from the fact that Dr. Armes, Organist of Durham Cathedral, has consented to read a paper on "Church Music of Purcell's period." This will occur at the evening meeting of Thursday, October 10, in St. Andrew's Hall. Musical illustrations will be rendered by the choir of Norwich Cathedral under Dr. Bates, the Cathedral organist, and it is hoped Dr. Bunnett will preside at the organ. It may be interesting to add that Dr. Armes was in his younger days one of the choirboys at Norwich under Dr. Z. Buck.

MUSIC IN GLASGOW.

(FROM OUR OWN CORRESPONDENT.)

IT is now, of course, pretty well known that the coming musical season in Glasgow will be one of the busiest on record. Again the forces of the Glasgow Choral Union and those of the Scottish Orchestra Company have joined hands, and the arrangements, so far as yet completed, are highly satisfactory—generous in some respects it might, indeed, be said as regards the Choral Concerts. These will be four in number, apart from the time-honoured performance of "The Messiah," an event which is now indelibly associated with the doings of Glasgow's premier Choral Society, inasmuch as people come from far and near to renew acquaintance with Handel's work on the first morning of a new year. The season commences on November 5, and will extend over a period of sixteen weeks; the choral works already fixed include Mendelssohn's "St. Paul" (first part) and the same composer's "Hear my Prayer," as also his setting of the 42nd Psalm; Saint-Saëns's sacred opera "Samson and Deïllah" (first time in Scotland), Dvorák's "Spectre's Bride," the Grail Scene from Wagner's "Parsifal" (first time), and selections from the works of Handel on the lines of the Handel Festival selection programmes. The programmes of the ten Classical Orchestral Concerts will, it is understood, contain many new and interesting features, and it is satisfactory to know that the band, numbering eighty performers, will again be led by Mr. Maurice Sons. Mr. Joseph Bradley will, happily, be found at his old post as Conductor of the Choral Concerts, and a hearty welcome awaits Mr. William Kes, late of Amsterdam, the new conductor of the Scottish Orchestra. The usual series of Saturday Popular Concerts will, of course, be given during the season. Engagements have already been made with many eminent soloists, and the list includes Misses Macintyre, Giulia Ravogli, Palliser, Butt, Madame Clara Samuell, and Mrs. Katherine Fisk; Messrs. Hedmond, Iver McKay, Piercy, Alec Marsh, Bispham, and Andrew Black. The solo instrumentalists comprise Lady Hallé, Mr. Willy Burmeister, Madame Teresa Carreño, and Messrs. Leonard Borwick and Moritz Rosenthal. The detailed prospectus may be expected on an early date.

"Legion" best describes the number of miscellaneous Concerts already arranged for the coming winter. Madame Adelina Patti returns to Glasgow in October next, and later on the Messrs. Harrison will also give other three Concerts. Madame Albani, Dr. Richter with his orchestra, Mr. Sarasate, the Meister Glee Singers, Mr. Emil Sauer, and several other well known artists are all due in Glasgow during the season, and lovers of the lyric drama will be amply cared for in November next, when the Royal Carl Rosa Opera Company appear at the new Theatre Royal.

The sixth session of the School of Music in connection with the Glasgow Athenæum commences on the 9th inst., and the prospectus issued by the directors of that flourishing Institution is again of an attractive nature. The success of the venture has, indeed, been phenomenal, thanks in no small measure to the tactical skill and ability of Mr. Allan Macbeth, the Principal; to Mr. James Lauder, the capable secretary; and to many experienced musicians whose names will be found on the list of professors.

The Paisley Choral Union, another flourishing concern, has taken up Mr. W. A. Barrett's cantata "The Death of Cuthullin" and Gounod's "The Redemption," and it is understood that Mr. Hamish MacCunn, who has been holidaying in Greenock, his native place, has consented to write a glee for the Glasgow Male-Voice Quartet party. The words will be from the pen of Mr. James MacCunn, the composer's father.

It is pleasing to note that Dr. A. L. Peace has revived his Organ Recitals in the Glasgow Cathedral. These are welcome, because it must be some six or seven years since the accomplished Cathedral organist used to draw many amateurs to our venerable pile. He must have been more than encouraged on the evening of the 19th ult., when the choir of the edifice was completely filled by a thoroughly representative audience. The programme was in excellent taste and it need not at this hour be said how well Dr. Peace acquitted himself. Other six Recitals will be given during the next few weeks.

MUSIC IN LIVERPOOL.

(FROM OUR OWN CORRESPONDENT.)

The first skeleton scheme of the Philharmonic Society has now been issued, the greater works included in the programme of the Concerts to be given this side of Christmas being Handel's "Alexander's Feast," Goring Thomas's "Swan and the Skylark," and Mendelssohn's "Hymn of Praise." No word as yet appears in regard to Symphonic music, but in this respect the matter may well be left in all confidence to the judgment of Sir Charles Hallé, who generally manages to give the subscribers quality and quantity to suit all tastes. The first Concert takes place on October 8.

A brief announcement has appeared as to the resumption of the customary Harrison series, and this seems to complete the list of such things as relate to ordinary Concerts for the present, the season just now being more devoid even of promise than is usual during holiday time.

The Sunday Society has secured St. George's Hall for twenty Concerts, and to allow of this the winter Organ Recitals, which previously alternated with the first-named performances on Sunday afternoons, have had to be abandoned. They have been a somewhat costly matter for the ratepayers, and the attendance has not been encouraging, something less than 300 auditors being the average at each, while as many thousands have thronged the hall at the Sunday Society's Concerts.

Too late for notice last month, there came the Annual Meeting of the Chester Diocesan Choral Association, in St. Werburga's Cathedral. The amalgamated choirs numbered about 1,000 voices, which were from the following choirs:—Cathedral (ladies) Nave choir, New Brighton, St. Thomas's (Stockport), Parish Church (Stockport), Newton Moor, Northenden, Chadkirk, St. George's (Altrincham), Hyde, St. Paul's (Chester), Christ Church (Chester), Sale, Upton, Cholmondeley, Bromborough, Mottram, Conleton, Bowden, St. Mark's (Birkenhead), Tranmere, Smallwood, Malpas, New Ferry, and Rock Ferry. The Rev. Hylton Stewart conducted, Dr. J. C. Bridge and Mr. J. T. Hughes being at the organ; the accompaniments were supplemented by Gladman's band from Lichfield.

The only musical society from this district which has so far given publicity to its intentions is that of Runcorn, where the works selected are Gade's "Erl-King's Daughter," Barnett's "Ancient Mariner," and Mendelssohn's "Elijah."

MUSIC IN PARIS.

(FROM OUR OWN CORRESPONDENT.)

THE only musical event to be mentioned since the end of the season is the Public "Concours" of each of the Conservatoire classes. These displays prove a source of great interest to the public, who rush to secure any available seats. It would seem, however, to be a doubtful pleasure to listen to twenty-two successive performances of Rubinstein's Concerto, or thirty-four of Chopin's Allegro. We need not enter into any details of these performances, but will simply content ourselves with saying that a good deal of satisfactory work is accomplished at the Conservatoire. We may, however, note that Mlle. Marignan obtained a first prize in the three classes for singing, opera, and opéra comique. The first three prizes for the pianoforte (men) were won by pupils from M. de Bériot's class. Young Lazzare, a boy fourteen years of age and a pupil of M. Diemer, played Rubinstein's Concerto with remarkable facility of execution. If this boy is not allowed to enter on the dangerous career of an infant prodigy he will certainly become a great pianist. Another child, Mlle. Strobats, eleven years old, created quite a sensation among the audience. She played Parish Alvars' Concerto for the harp with extraordinary brilliancy. This charming work by Parish Alvars is well written, and, accompanied by a double quartet, created a very good effect. Only the Opera now remains open, but music is in full swing at all the sea-side resorts; the casinos are not sufficient, and even in the poorest churches performances of musical masses are being organised.

MUSIC IN AMERICA.

THE chronicle of events since last writing might be summed up in a sentence almost as brief as the famous report of the old-time sea captain on the manners and customs of the Fiji Islanders: "Manners, none; customs, nasty." The return of Mr. Henry E. Abbey from Europe, where he has been completing the engagements for next winter's season of opera at the Metropolitan Opera House, confirms the announcements already made, and adds the intelligence that the baritone Kaschmann and Miss Clara Hunt, an American contralto who has been studying in Paris, have been included in the company. Two new tenors, Messrs. Cremonini and Lubert, will also be heard. Signor Bevigiani will be the conductor for everything except German work, which, as already stated, will be in the hands of Mr. Seidl. Signor Mancinelli will not return. The season's performances will open on November 18 with either "Carmen" or "Tristan and Isolde."

The Wagnerian opera, to be given under Mr. Damrosch will be heard at the old Academy of Music. The history of this house as the home of grand opera practically came to an end with the close of the Mapleson dynasty. For a short time afterwards the organisation known as the "National Opera Company" occupied it with works sung in English; but that venture was short-lived, and since then it has been given over to theatrical performances, mostly of the sort which require a very large stage, which the Academy possesses. Old New Yorkers, whose memories run back over the brilliant scenes enacted in the Academy in former years, will be glad to see the old house re-invested with something of its former prestige. Mr. Damosch's venture will be worth watching as an indication of the extent to which the location of a building will affect the success of the performances given in it. Fashionable New York has completely deserted the neighbourhood of the Academy and moved a long way off. It will be interesting to see whether the wealthy patrons of the opera in New York (many of whom are in a manner committed to the Metropolitan either as stockholders or as habitual box owners) will feel an interest in Wagnerian music-drama sufficient to bring them the long distance from their "up-town" residences down to the mercantile and somewhat shabby neighbourhood of the old Academy. However, Mr. Damosch's ventures have usually been well advised, and it is to be hoped that this one will prove no exception to the rule. The German population of New York is still on the East side of the city, and some of it in neighbourhoods from which the Academy is fairly accessible. How important this question of location may become will easily be seen when it is remembered that transportation in New York means movement northward or southward, that the Academy of Music is at Fourteenth Street, a street which is very much farther "down-town" to-day than it was "up-town" when the building was erected, and when it is further remembered that by the elevated railroad (the swiftest method of travel which the city affords) it takes the best part of an hour to reach it from the upper part of the city, where a strong contingent of its German inhabitants live.

The engagement of Mr. Frank van der Stucken as conductor of the Cincinnati permanent orchestra left a vacancy in the conductorship of the Arion Society of New York. It is said that there were fifty-eight applicants for the place, which has just been filled by the appointment of Julius Lorenz, of Glogau, Silesia, as director, at an annual salary of 2,000 dollars. Mr. Lorenz has also been offered the position of conductor of the Arion Society of Newark, New Jersey, at a salary of 1,000 dollars. He is expected to take up his new duties in the Fall.

There are two or three associations of professional musicians in New York, outside the Musical Union, which is in the nature of a trade union, of which, perhaps, the most important are the Clef Club and the Manuscript Society. The Clef Club has all along preserved a more social character, preceding its meetings with a dinner, and devoting considerable attention to the informal exchange of ideas and opinions among its members. The Manuscript Society has heretofore kept to a more serious line of work. Its primary object has been the production of manuscript works composed by its members, and it has shown great earnestness in securing the best attainable performances of these. Up to the present time the Society has had a rather local character, and has not been very large, but this year it has taken a new departure, and is now enlarging its membership by including many of the best professional musicians in the country, irrespective of the distances at which they may live from New York. It is now proposed to put the Society more upon the basis of a social club, while at the same time it will not at all abandon its original purpose. Quarters for the new club have been engaged, and it is expected that these will be ready for occupancy by October, after which date the initiation fees will be increased. The formal opening of the club house will include a series of receptions and the exhibition of a collection of manuscripts, old and new. A part of the building will be fitted up as studios for teaching members. Six private meetings (Concerts of chamber music) will be given in the club house between the months of November and May, and four public Concerts during the season will be given, instead of three, as heretofore. Of these, three will be with orchestra and one will be devoted to chamber music. Of the three Orchestral Concerts it is proposed to devote one to operatic selections, one to oratorio and cantata excerpts, and one to symphonic works. Negotiations are pending with the foremost musical conductors of the country, and a complete programme of the works to be performed, and the orchestral and choral bodies engaged to interpret them, will be announced at the beginning of the season. The list of musical conductors who are members of the Society includes the names of Mr. Anton Seidl, Mr. Walter Damosch, Mr. Sam Franko, Mr. Richard H. Warren, of New York; Mr. Emil Fauer and Mr. Carl Zerrahn, of Boston; and Mr. Theodore Thomas, of Chicago. All executants at both private and public Concerts must be members of the Society, except in the case of large orchestral or choral bodies, when the conductors must be members. This last rule secures for the compositions presented renderings of as high an order of merit as can be procured in this country. There are five classes of members: active (composers, who must submit a manuscript in polyphonic form for criticism, upon the result of which the action of the Society is based), professional (who must be executants), associate (amateurs), life, and honorary. At the last annual meeting the Society extended its membership limit to 1,000, and it is confidently expected that this limit will be reached before October 1. Seventy-nine applications were received during one week in May.

In the field of Church music there have been a few recent changes which may be of interest to note, chiefly because the persons concerned are for the most part Englishmen. The transfer of Mr. Lacy Baker from St. Peter's, Philadelphia, to St. James's of that city, left the position at St. Peter's open from October 1. This has been filled by the appointment of Mr. Sippel, of Bethesda Church, Saratoga. The Saratoga place has in turn been filled by the appointment of Mr. A. S. Houghton, of Ann Arbor, Michigan. The Ann Arbor place is unfilled at date of writing. Mr. James Pearce has resigned the organ of St. John's Church, Yonkers, New York—an important post just outside the limits of the city—and has been succeeded by Mr. A. E. Jeffery, formerly of the Cathedral at Albany.

IN connection with the celebration of the centenary of the London Missionary Society, a Children's Musical Festival took place at the Crystal Palace on July 27. Most of the young people came from London, but there were several contingents from Luton, Brighton, Tunbridge, Redhill, &c. A Sunday School choir competition was included in the proceedings, the conditions being that each choir should sing a piece of its own selection and also the hymn "Who is this so weak and helpless?" The first prize was gained by the Kentish Town Congregational School; the second by Bromley (Kent) Congregational School; the third by Christ Church, Enfield; and the fourth by Chapman Road, Clapton. Subsequently there was a Sacred Concert on the Handel Orchestra by a choir of about 1,500 voices, Mr. Luther Hinton (who was one of the judges in the choir competition) conducting, whilst Mr. Horace G. Holmes presided at the organ. The hymn "A Message to the Nations" was sung with particularly good effect, and much fervour marked the rendering of the centenary hymn, "The whole wide world for Jesus." The vocal pieces were interspersed with performances by the Crystal Palace Orchestra.

WE may remind our readers that two important provincial Festivals will take place during the present month, the first at Gloucester on the 10th, 11th, 12th, and 13th inst., and the second at Cardiff on the 18th, 19th, 20th, and 21st inst. Details of the programmes of both Festivals have already appeared in THE MUSICAL TIMES. We may, however, recapitulate that at Gloucester the important works will comprise Brahms's "Song of Destiny," Parry's "King Saul," Dvorák's "Stabat Mater," Beethoven's Mass in C, "Elijah," the "Hymn of Praise," and "The Messiah," while the novelties will be "The Transfiguration," by F. H. Cowen, a Church Cantata by C. Lee Williams, and a new Concerto by Dr. C. H. Lloyd. At Cardiff the chief works will be Tinel's Oratorio "St. Francis," Verdi's "Requiem," Berlioz's "Faust," Spohr's "Last Judgment," the Choral Symphony, Sullivan's "Light of the World" (conducted by the composer), "St. Paul," and "The Messiah." The novelties by British composers are two short works—"The Bard," by Professor Stanford, and "The Psalm of Life," by David Jenkins (each conducted by its composer).

AN interesting "Gounod Festival" in the Border Towns will be held at the Exchange Halls, Hawick, on November 14 and 15. The programme for the first date will comprise selections from "The Redemption" and "Mors et Vita," and a Romance for violin solo (M. Maurice Sons), which has not before been heard in this country; and on the Friday evening the programme will include the Garden Scene, Soldiers' Chorus, and Kermesse from "Faust," the Intermezzo from "Philemon et Baucis," the Balcony Scene from "Romeo and Juliet," and several of the composer's most popular songs, including "There is a green hill far away," "Nazareth," &c. There will be a full orchestra and a chorus of 300 voices selected from the five Border Towns. No less than five honorary conductors and five honorary organists figure in the prospectus, and the fact that a guarantee of over £300 has been subscribed augurs well for the financial prospects of the Festival.

GERMAN musical journals express themselves generally in favour of Dr. Chrysander's views in regard to the execution of Handelian scores, as exemplified at the recent Mayence Festival, and are unanimous in their praise of the performances. As regards the soloists, the palm is accorded jointly to M. Messchaert and Mr. Edward Lloyd, and that in no measured terms. Thus Professor Emil Krause, a highly competent German critical authority, says, in Die Sängerkirche, of Leipzig:—"M. Messchaert rendered the part of the titular hero (in the "Hercules" performance) in an unsurpassable manner, both as regards truth of expression and beauty of vocalisation. Worthily by his side stood Mr. Lloyd, as Hyllos. Probably never before has there been heard in German concert-rooms a tenor commanding in such perfection, and in its every detail, the art of oratorio singing."

THE first great Bavarian Provincial Musical Festival is to be held from the 26th to the 29th of next month, at Bamberg, under the conductorship of Herr Max Leit-häuser. The performances will be inaugurated on the 26th with an opera expressly composed for the occasion, the libretto of which deals with a legend connected with the city of Bamberg. On the second day, a grand Concert will be given in the Municipal Theatre, by prominent Bavarian artists, both vocal and instrumental. The third day will be devoted to performances by the united choirs of the leading choral societies of the kingdom; and the Festival will terminate (on October 29) with a grand Orchestral Concert, in which several new works will obtain a first hearing. The orchestral body will comprise eighty executants.

A Matinée Musicale, under the patronage of His Royal Highness the Duke of Cambridge, was given on the 9th ult., at Homburg, by Miss Kate Brigstoke, a lady well known in Leeds musical circles as a pianist and concert-giver. Miss Brigstoke, who is the daughter of the English chaplain at Homburg, and a late pupil of the Frankfurt Conservatorium, created a most favourable impression by the ease and brilliancy of her touch and general proficiency, and was greatly applauded in pieces by Schumann, Chopin, Liszt, and others. She was ably assisted by Fräulein K. Freyberg (contralto) and Herr H. Warnke (violinello), both well known local artists.

THE last Pianoforte Recital of the summer season was given by M. de Greef, at St. James's Hall, on July 27. The performer should be blamed for giving isolated movements from esteemed works, such as Chopin's Sonata in B flat minor (Op. 35) and Schumann's "Faschingsschwank aus Wien," but his rendering of them was brilliant and tasteful, as also of pieces by Schumann, Moszkowski, and other composers. The measure of success attained by M. de Greef was very satisfactory, considering the lateness of his visit, and he is assured of a warm welcome on his next appearance in London.

AT St. James's Hall three Richter Concerts will be given on Monday evenings, October 21 and 28, and Monday afternoon, November 4; Señor Sarasate will give three Concerts, with the co-operation of Madame Berthe Goldschmidt, on Saturday afternoons, October 19 and November 2, and Monday afternoon, December 2; and

Mr. Rosenthal will give three Pianoforte Recitals on Wednesday afternoons, October 30, November 13, and Monday afternoon, December 9. All the above Concerts will be under the direction of Mr. N. Vert.

NOT the least interesting feature of "The Dictionary of British Musicians," which Messrs. Jarrold will issue shortly, is the addition of very many authors connected with British musical bibliography which have never before appeared in any dictionary. It is also stated that the work goes back to such early times as the ancient British bards, and includes the names of all the principal musicians before the public at the present time, and the publication of the volume should be of considerable interest.

MADAME MELBA'S American tour will extend over three months. Over forty Concerts will be given, the first part of each consisting of miscellaneous selections, and the second of an entire act from either "Faust," "Rigoletto," "Hamlet," "Traviata," or "Lucia." Madame Melba's company will include Madame Scalchi, Mdlle. Bauermeister, and Mr. D'Aubigné; and Mr. Landon Ronald, a son of Henry Russell, will conduct a special orchestra which Madame Melba has engaged to accompany her.

THE latest invention for turning the leaves of music, "Joyce's Music Leaf Turner," is by far the simplest device hitherto brought before musicians. There are no springs, the leaves being turned by means of a toothed wheel, set in motion by pressing a knob. Pressure on a lower knob turns the leaf backwards—a great advantage in the case of music that has to be repeated. The instrument fits on to any ordinary music-stand, and is certainly in advance of anything of the kind we have previously seen.

SIR AUGUSTUS HARRIS has acquired the right to produce at Covent Garden next season "La Vivandière," an opera by the late Benjamin Godard, recently produced at the Opéra Comique. The chief character will be played by Madame Calvé. The libretto is by M. Henri Cain, the well known painter, and the author of "La Navarraise." The orchestration of the last two acts, having been left unfinished at the composer's death, has been completed by M. Paul Vidal.

ON Sunday, the 11th ult., at St. Joseph's Retreat, Highgate, Mr. Henry J. Wood's Grand Mass in E flat was given for the first time, conducted by the composer; and in the evening Rossini's "Stabat Mater" was sung. The soloists were Masters Balfre and Barker; and Messrs. Valentine Smith, Lloyd Chandos, Herbert Linwood, William Ludwig, W. A. Peterkin, and F. Fisher. Mr. Volanti Armitage presided at the organ on both occasions.

AN autumn season of opera in English is to be given by Mr. Hedmond at Covent Garden, commencing early in October with "Tannhäuser." Mr. Goossens, late of the Carl Rosa Company, will act as conductor. It is expected that Wagner's "Flying Dutchman" will be revived, and an English version of "Die Walküre" will be produced, the latter under the direction of Mr. Henschel.

THE Bernhard Carodus String Quartet, consisting of Messrs. Bernhard M. Carodus, W. Richardson, R. Carodus, and J. F. Carodus, will give a series of three Chamber Concerts on November 7, 20, and December 5, at the Queen's Hall. The programmes will include, besides well known works, compositions by modern composers.

MADAME SCHUMANN has recently arranged for ordinary pianoforte (solo) all her late husband's Pedal Clavier compositions, known as "Sketches and Studies." This important publication will shortly be issued by Messrs. Novello, Ewer and Co.

THE prospectus of the Royal Choral Society was not issued at the time of our going to press, but we understand that it is intended to perform, during the season, Dr. Hubert Parry's "Invocation" Ode in honour of Purcell, which will be heard first at the Leeds Festival.

CAVALIERE ZAVERTHAL, the Director of the Royal Artillery Band, intends giving an annual Concert, at Queen's Hall, for the sole purpose of introducing the works of British composers. Such a laudable intention cannot fail to meet with hearty recognition.

MR. CHARLES MACPHERSON has been appointed sub-organist at St. Paul's Cathedral, in place of the late Mr. Hodge. Mr. Macpherson was formerly a choirboy at St. Paul's.

MR. HUGH BLAIR, who has for some years been assistant-organist at Worcester Cathedral, has now been appointed organist in place of the late Dr. Done.

PROFESSOR VILLIERS STANFORD's Mass in G is to be performed in the Hofburgkapelle at Vienna during the winter, under the direction of Dr. Richter.

DR. GEORGE J. BENNETT has been appointed organist of Lincoln Cathedral, in succession to Mr. J. M. W. Young, who has retired after many years of service.

MR. F. A. W. DOCKER, the organist of St. Andrew's, Wells Street, has been appointed Professor of the Organ at the Guildhall School of Music.

MESSRS. PLUNKET GREENE and Borwick will resume their Song and Pianoforte Recitals at St. James's Hall in October and November.

SIGNOR TAMAGNO will sing the part of Nero on the first production in Italy of Dr. Boito's new opera "Nerone."

MR. ALFRED GIBSON has been appointed a Professor of the Violin at the Royal Academy of Music.

OBITUARY.

WE have to record the death of Dr. WILLIAM DONE, the esteemed organist of Worcester Cathedral, which occurred at his residence in the College on the 17th ult., at the advanced age of eighty. For seventy years he had been in the service of the Cathedral, holding the position of organist for more than half-a-century, and conducting the Triennial Musical Festivals during that period, with the exception of the last meeting, when failing health compelled him to hand over the duties to the assistant-organist, Mr. Blair. The deceased musician's career was typical of the Provincial organist of the old school. A native of Worcester, young Done became a choirboy at the Cathedral in 1825, and was subsequently apprenticed to Clarke, the then organist, who in 1839 appointed him his assistant, and upon Clarke's death, in 1844, he was nominated his successor. Done's mastery over his instrument rendered him widely known in his day. He effected many necessary changes and improvements in the musical services of the Cathedral, not the least important and successful of which was the introduction, some fifteen years since, of Bach's "Passion" Music into the special services during Holy Week; while to him also is mainly due the formation and careful training of the excellent voluntary choir. He was the conductor, for many years, of the Worcester Choral Society, and some of his compositions for the church have been much appreciated. Obviously, in such a career, the notable events are but few, and arising mainly from the exercise of its professional duties. Thus his memory carried him back to the first Worcester Festival in which he took part, when Pasta sang and George IV. was present. His subsequent assumption of the duties of festival conductor brought him into association with the foremost musicians and musical celebrities of his time, and the crowning event of his life was the celebration last year of the jubilee of his organistship, on which occasion the honorary degree of Doctor of Music was conferred upon him by the Archbishop of Canterbury.

The death is announced, on July 24, at Paris, of HENRI ALTÈS, the celebrated flute player, aged seventy. He was for many years solo flautist at the Paris Opéra, and since 1868 professor of his instrument at the Conservatoire, from which post he only retired last year, when he was succeeded by M. Taffanel. M. Altès, who was the brother of M. Ernest Altès, the former chef d'orchestre at the Opéra, has written a number of compositions for his instrument, with orchestral accompaniment or that of the pianoforte.

DR. GEORGE F. ROOT, the popular composer of songs, died suddenly, on the 6th ult., at Bailey's Island, Maine, U.S.A., aged seventy-five. He was born in Sheffield, Mass., on August 30, 1820, and worked on his father's farm until he was eighteen, by which time he had already acquired, entirely unaided, a certain proficiency on several musical instruments. He then went to Boston for the purpose of taking some lessons, supporting himself meanwhile as best he could, and in 1844 took up his abode in New York, where he soon gained a reputation as a teacher of the pianoforte. Ten years later he visited Paris, where he pursued his studies for a year. Returned to the United States, he published his song "Hazel Dell," in 1853, the first of a great number of others that followed, and which had an immense vogue on both sides of the Atlantic; notably his "Tramp, tramp, the boys are marching," and other war songs on the side of the North, composed during the Civil War. Dr. Root was the founder of the Normal Musical Institute in America and the author of several theoretical works on the art. It is a melancholy reflection for the relatives of the deceased musician, now in England, that he was within a fortnight of celebrating his golden wedding, and that the diploma of honorary membership of the Tonic Sol-fa College, which had been conferred upon him recently, was on its way across the Atlantic.

TERESA BRAMBILLA, one of five sisters who attained celebrity as operatic singers during the earlier part of the century, the most famous of them being Marietta, the contralto, died recently at Milan, in her eighty-third year. She was born at Cassano d'Adda in 1813. Gifted with a rich soprano voice, Teresa became a pupil at the Milan Conservatorio, and, after having gained experience at several minor theatres, she made her début at La Scala, Milan, in 1837, when she took part, with her elder sister, Marietta, and others, in the performance of the cantata "On the death of Malibran," written conjointly by Donizetti, Pacini, Mercadante, Vaccai, and Coppola. Her reputation became henceforth established. She was the original Gilda at the first performance of Verdi's "Rigoletto" in 1851, at Venice, and achieved an enormous success both at the Théâtre Italien, in Paris, and at Madrid. For many years past she had lived in retirement.

PROFESSOR GUSTAV ENGEL, the eminent teacher of dramatic singing, and the doyen of Berlin musical critics, died in that capital on July 19, at the age of seventy-one. Engel was born at Königsberg on October 29, 1823, and studied philology at that University, while his musical instructors were the celebrated Berlin professors, Marx, for theory, and Heinrich Kottzolt, for vocal art. He was appointed to the teaching staff of the Berlin Royal Hochschule für Musik in 1874, and numbered amongst his more celebrated pupils Theresa Malten, Lola Beeth, Jetta Finkenstein, Bullis, Krollop, and others. Equally important was his activity as a critic, which he commenced in 1853 on the now defunct Spener'sche Zeitung and continued in the columns of the influential Vossische Zeitung, with which journal he had been associated since 1861. Amongst his brilliant Berlin contemporaries—Otto Gumprecht, Heinrich Dorn, and Louis Ehlert, the two latter of whom have preceded him in death—were the least brilliant, perhaps, but the most erudite and highly cultured; and while representing a somewhat ultra-conservative standpoint, his judgment was never unduly biassed. The deceased has published an analysis of Mozart's "Don Giovanni," and a valuable contribution to the aesthetics of the art entitled "Ästhetik der Tonkunst," besides several philosophical and physiological works.

A highly meritorious musician, Musik-director JOSEF RENNEN, died on the 11th ult., at Regensburg, after a protracted illness. He was born at Schmatzhäusen, near Landshut, in 1832, and received his first musical instruction from his father, who was the schoolmaster of the village. In 1858 he was appointed choral conductor and teacher at the Aula Scholastica in Regensburg, an appointment which he held until he fell ill three years ago. During the intervening thirty-five years his indefatigable zeal and devotion to his art, together with the amiability of his character, rendered him one of the most influential and justly esteemed personalities in the musical life of Regensburg. He was the conductor for many years of the choral and orchestral societies, held a professorship at the Regensburg School for Church Music, and some thirty years since founded the Musical Institute bearing his name, and which he personally superintended up to 1882.

In addition to this beneficial local activity Renner has earned the gratitude of musicians and music-lovers generally by his zealous revival of German madrigals of the sixteenth and seventeenth centuries, for which purpose he founded the Regensburg Madrigal Choir, the performances of which have obtained enthusiastic recognition in Concert tours in all the larger towns of Germany.

ACHILLE LEMOINE, head of the well-known French music publishing firm, died at his residence at Sèvres last month, aged eighty-three. The business was established in Paris by his grandfather, Antoine Lemoine, in 1780, and had been under the chief proprietary charge of the deceased for over forty years, in the course of which many important publications have been issued by the house, notably the collection of classical pianoforte music in several volumes, entitled "Le Panthéon des Pianistes," which preceded the similar publications, at popular prices, of Peters and Litolf. M. Achille Lemoine was an accomplished pianist, pupil of Bertini and Kalkbrenner, and the composer, in his earlier days, of a number of pieces for that instrument under the nom de plume of Heintz. He was a Chevalier of the Legion of Honour.

The death is announced, on July 20, at Milan, of the once celebrated ballet director, GIOVANNI CASATI, aged eighty-six. Amongst the numerous ballets of his invention which have added brilliancy to the seasons of La Scala, may be instanced "Sardanapolo," "Il Diavolo a quattro," "Il Profeta Velato," and others. To several of these, being an excellent musician, he had also written the music. Like Taglioni, Casati had several children who spread the fame of their father throughout the civilised world.

HENRI WITMEUR, Professor of Mineralogy and Geology at the University and the Ecole Polytechnique of Brussels, died recently in that town. M. Witmeur was a musical amateur of considerable attainments and the composer of numerous songs; one of them, the "Chant des Etudiants," having achieved great popularity in Belgium.

Spanish papers announce the death recently at Barcelona of FEDERICO SOLER, the Catalan poet and dramatic author, in his fifty-seventh year. Under the pseudonym of Serafi Pitarra, Soler wrote a vast number of poesias, dramas, and comedies, all of them in the Catalan dialect, which justly attained great popularity throughout Spain, and obtained for him the recognition of the Madrid Royal Academy. Amongst the nine librettos of zarzuelas from his pen may be instanced "Los Pescadores de San Pol," "Los Estudiantes de Cervera," and "La Rambla de los Flors," the latter in collaboration with the composer, Felin y Codina. There was an imposing demonstration of public sympathy at his funeral.

We have also to record the following deaths:—

On July 16, through an accident on the mountains near Ried Lötschenthal, Valais, Switzerland, in his twenty-sixth year, EDWARD FELIX MENDELSSOHN BENECKE, a grandson of the composer of "Elijah."

On July 19, at Fredriksvaern, CARL WARMUTH, chief of the well known music publishing firm of Christiania, excellent musician, and proprietor of the Nordisk Musiktidende, aged fifty-one.

On July 31, at Schandau, JULIUS RAMMELSBURG, esteemed violinist.

Recently, at Cassel, Frau EMILIE ZAHN, only surviving daughter of Louis Spohr, and herself also musically gifted, aged eighty-nine.

Recently, at Connorsville, Indianapolis, MARY TATE, pianist, aged twenty-one.

On the 1st ult., at Leipzig, EMIL TREFFTZ, distinguished musical amateur, member of the directorates of the Royal Conservatorium and the Gewandhaus Concerts, and President of the Bach Society, in his eightieth year.

On the 2nd ult., at Kansas City, U.S.A., ERNEST APPY, violoncellist, native of Amsterdam, aged sixty.

On the 2nd ult., at Cologne, META KALMAN, highly popular operatic singer, much appreciated also in Berlin.

Recently, at Florence, GIUSEPPE RINI, a well known impresario.

On the 4th ult., at St. Andrew's Place, Bradford, ROBERT LEACH, President of the Bradford Choral Society, in his sixty-second year.

Recently, at Paris, HIPPOLITE DE VOS, esteemed musical critic, one of the redacteurs of the Nouvelle France Chorale, of which his brother, M. Camille de Vos, is the chief editor.

On the 12th ult., at Munich, Professor LUDWIG ABEL, violinist, pupil of David, inspector at the Royal Academie der Tonkunst, composer of violin music and author of a violin school much in vogue, aged sixty.

Recently, at Munich, FRAU FRANZISKA RITTER (née Wagner), a niece of the Bayreuth master.

On the 5th ult., at Pitten, near Vienna, ANTON STINGL, chief of the well known Viennese pianoforte manufacturing firm, aged seventy.

Recently, at Baltimore, RUDOLPH GREEN, excellent violoncellist, member of the Seidl Orchestra and of the Peabody Quartet, aged fifty-four.

CORRESPONDENCE.

SENZA SORDINO.

TO THE EDITOR OF "THE MUSICAL TIMES."

SIR,—As a contribution towards solving the meaning of senza sordino and con sordino in Beethoven, may I offer the subjoined?

Mr. Hipkins, in "Pedals," Grove's Dictionary, says Zumppe's pianofortes had the dampers moved by mechanism governed by stops, and that "Stein's and other German pianos had a lever to be pressed by the knee."

Mr. Hipkins, in "Sordini," Grove's Dictionary, says that Beethoven did not use the term Ped. in his earlier works because the pedal was of recent introduction.

Carl Czerny was a pupil of Beethoven. In his Piano School, Vol. IV., he says that he "studied many of Beethoven's works under the Master's own guidance," and enjoyed his "friendly and instructive intercourse"; that he had been asked to treat in his School of the performance of Beethoven's works. The fourth volume is made up chiefly of suggestions "on the proper performance of all Beethoven's works for the piano solo," including metronome marks giving "the time in which Beethoven himself performed his works," and very full instructions for the use of "the pedal," as he calls it in every case—the "damper," "loud," or "right foot" pedal. One sentence says that "Beethoven employed the pedal much more frequently than we find it indicated in his compositions."

In his remarks on Op. 26, Variation 5, Czerny says: "The last fifteen bars senza sordino—that is, with the pedal, as it was indicated at the period when this Sonata appeared." See paragraph three, above. In the Funeral March, he says: "In the Trio (in A flat) the senza sordino (pedal) prescribed by the author is employed as follows":—

To the Sonata in C sharp minor (Op. 27), first movement, he gives the direction "sempre senza sordino," explaining this by "the prescribed pedal must be re-employed at each note in the bass." Further, he directs where the pp pedal is to be used and where it is not to be used, in conjunction with the senza sordino or damper pedal in this movement, saying that Beethoven used the pp shifting pedal in the way he prescribes. In the third movement, presto agitato, he says that at the ff quaver chords at the end of bar two of this movement, and wherever they occur, "the pedal must always be used."

In the suggestions as to playing the Rondo of Op. 53 he says: "This Rondo, of a Pastoral character, is entirely calculated for the use of the pedal, which is here actually expressed"; and in a foot-note to this same sentence he says: "The indication senza sordino was only continued as long as the pedal was pressed with the knee." See paragraphs two and three above.

Czerny never speaks of a pp pedal (leather or felt interposed between hammer and strings and called sordino). He does say that there were pedals other than the two we now use, but that they were discarded, "all others being acknowledged as unworthy of the true artist's notice." His pp pedal is the "shifting pedal." Senza sordino with him is a lever pressed by the knee, by which the dampers are raised, and is an earlier indication for producing the effect later on, and now obtained by means of Ped. Con sordino is the opposite of this, and equals **.*

Czerny ought to know what he is talking about; he himself is sure of the correctness of his remarks, and claims, in a concluding paragraph to the Solo Sonatas, that his remarks are correct. If he is any authority in pianoforte matters, and Beethoven in particular, the above should be of value.

I may perhaps be allowed to say that when I was a youth I was taught that senza sordino and con sordino were the word-equivalent of *Ped. . . ; that I have never since heard a suggestion to the contrary; and to the best of my recollection, never read one till the July note to Mr. Shinn's letter and this month's article, and I have read every number of THE MUSICAL TIMES since 1856.—Yours faithfully,
R. B. BATEMAN.

TUNES FOR CHURCH BELLS.

TO THE EDITOR OF "THE MUSICAL TIMES."

SIR,—Would any of your readers be so good as to tell me of some suitable tunes for bell chimes? I already have most of those commonly adopted for such purposes, but feel sure that many other tunes will be known to the readers of THE MUSICAL TIMES.

I also know the three pretty compositions which have been published for the pianoforte, entitled "Carillons de Dunkerque," "Salzburg Chimes," and "Holsworthy Church Bells"; probably there are other pieces published equally suitable. I should be very grateful for any information on the subject. My clock has fourteen bells.—Yours, &c.,
HENRY T. TILLEY.

St. Mary's Vicarage, Smethwick.

TO CORRESPONDENTS.

. Notices of concerts, of which programmes must invariably be sent, and other information supplied by our friends in the country, must be forwarded as early as possible after the occurrence; otherwise they cannot be inserted.

Our correspondents will oblige by writing all names as clearly as possible, as we cannot be responsible for any mistakes that may occur.

Correspondents are informed that their names and addresses must accompany all communications.

We cannot undertake to return offered contributions; the authors, therefore, will do well to retain copies.

Notice is sent to all subscribers whose payment (in advance) is exhausted. The paper will be discontinued where the Subscription is not renewed. We again remind those who are disappointed in obtaining back numbers that, although the music is always kept in stock, only a sufficient quantity of the rest of the paper is printed to supply the current sale.

BRIEF SUMMARY OF COUNTRY NEWS.

We do not hold ourselves responsible for any opinions expressed in this summary, as all the notices are either collated from the local papers or supplied to us by correspondents.

BEDFORD.—Satisfactory evidence of the good teaching afforded at the School of Music over which Mr. Diemer presides was afforded on July 25, when a miscellaneous Concert was given by the students on the occasion of the distribution of certificates by the Mayoress.

BRIGHTON.—To a frequenter of Covent Garden stalls, an opera "Recital" in costume of the ad captandum motives in "Cavalleria," "Faust," and the "Bohemian Girl" does not sound attractive; but a chance auditor at Mr. Burgo's Opera Recitals at the Brighton West Pier in the last weeks of August would have felt more astonishment at the relatively spirited effect produced by such very slender means, than at the fact that so much talent should have led to the development of this little nomad troupe into something like an institution. Notwithstanding unavoidable shifts, such as doubling inconsistent parts, and the substitution of a Steinway pianoforte (very artistically played by Mr. Leslie Smith) for an orchestra, one was surprised at the successful imitation of their European prototypes on the grand opera stage. The little band of six performers do their spiriting with substantial accuracy, and, what is perhaps more important, the stage is never lifeless or dull. The very clever soprano ("prima donna assoluta") she would be ambitiously styled elsewhere), Madame Eugénie Morgan, may be pardoned if her gestures, always telling, verge on staginess; holiday-makers like that sort of thing, and the clear ring of her B flat in the "Jewel" song (with a piano which took it up to C) would atone for a little over-zeal. The impression produced by the whole show was one of gratification at the intellectual progress in fin de siècle Brighton.

CAPE TOWN, AFRICA.—An effective and much appreciated performance of Gounod's "Redemption" was given, on July 22, in the Good Hope Hall, under the able direction of Mr. T. Barrow-Dowling. Great praise is due to the choir for the intelligent manner in which the choral portions were sung, particularly for the devotional expression with which were rendered the beautiful opening sentences of the "Promise of Redemption"; the impressive delivery of the opening chorus of Part II., "Saviour of men"; and the vigour infused into the male choruses. Under such conditions the magnificent number "Unfold, ye portals everlasting," made its usual deep impression, and most advantageously displayed the capabilities of the choir. Equal justice was done to the fine music by the soloists, who were Madame Cheron-Saxon, Mrs. Vincent, Mr. C. H. Cawse, and Mr. Norman Salmond, the last-named singing the parts of the bass Narrator and also that of the Saviour. Valuable assistance was rendered by Mrs. Barrow-Dowling at the organ.

CARDIFF.—Dr. Joseph Parry's fourth opera, entitled "Sylvia," the libretto of which, by Mr. Mendelssohn Parry, deals with the Druids and Romans, was successfully produced on the 12th ult., at the Theatre Royal. The principal characters were effectively embodied by Miss van Dalle, Madame Hannah Jones, Mr. M. Humphreys, Mr. M. James, and Mr. Franklin Clive; and the choral and orchestral portions were well rendered. The work was heartily received by a large audience.

DOWNHAM MARKET.—Gounod's motet "Gallia," together with a vocal and instrumental miscellaneous selection, were rendered in a praiseworthy manner on Prize-day, on the 1st ult., at Hill House School. The vocal executants were Miss Cole, Mr. F. Cole, and Mr. H. Hilton. Instrumental solos were played by the Misses W. Cubitt, A. Lowe, and Noverre, and the performance as a whole reflected great credit on the music-master of the school, Mr. C. H. Lewis.

DUDLEY.—A Musical Service was given in the Parish Church on the 18th ult., when a selection from Handel's "Messiah" was performed by an augmented choir of about fifty voices. The soloists were Miss May Berry, Mrs. Bird, Mr. J. H. Round, and Mr. W. H. Smith. Mr. W. Stansfield presided at the organ, and Mr. G. H. Mainwaring, who has been connected with the choir for the long period of fifty-six years, conducted. The solos were effectively sung and the shoruses were well rendered, the leads being taken up with precision. This was Mr. Stansfield's last service here, as he was leaving to take an appointment in America. The large congregation of about two thousand, which came from all parts of the district, testified to the appreciation of the good work done by Mr. Stansfield during the past ten years in this neighbourhood. He was also made the recipient of valuable testimonials from the clergy, the Parish Church choir and congregation, and the Amateur Operatic Society.

EASTBOURNE.—The high standard of excellence attained by the Devonshire Park Orchestra, under the able direction of Mr. Norfolk Megone, has been well sustained during the past month, and the performances fully merit the support they receive. Beethoven's Fifth Symphony was played on the 8th ult., and the programmes, as a whole, are models of judicious selection.

EDINBURGH.—The second of the Musical Recitals in connection with the Edinburgh summer meetings was given at the Oddfellows' Hall, on the 19th ult., under the management of Mrs. Kennedy-Fraser, the subject, "Contrasts," having as illustration Mozart and Beethoven. Mrs. Kennedy-Fraser read an interesting and instructive paper, showing, amongst other things, how the musical characters of these two differed like their personal characters; how Mozart was influenced in his music by the aristocratic polish, politeness, and formal conventionalities of the patrons of his time, contrasting thus with Beethoven's more robust naturalness and directness of expression; also pointing out that with Mozart the tendency was to sacrifice emotional expression to formal beauty, whereas, with Beethoven, the form was made to obey the emotion. A well-selected programme was given, Miss Gertrude Peppercorn, a young Royal Academy student, of London, creating quite a sensation by her refined playing of Mozart's C minor Fantasia, and an altogether masterly and powerful interpretation of Beethoven's "Appassionata" Sonata. Excellent work, too, was done, vocally, by Miss Guthrie and Mrs. Tobias Matthay, Mr. T. H. Kennedy and Mr. W. Richardson. Besides well-known excerpts, less well-known songs were also given, amongst which, Beethoven's song-cycle, "An die ferne Geliebte," certainly should obtain more frequent hearing. Mr. Kennedy deserves praise for his excellent singing of this fine work. Miss Brown and Mr. Peter MacGregor also assisted. The last Concert, on the 26th ult., was devoted to Mendelssohn and Schumann.

EPFING.—The fine new organ, built by Messrs. Wordsworth, in the Parish Church was opened on the 8th ult., at a special service, the anthem being "The Wilderness" (Goss). Mr. Donald Penrose accompanied the service, at the close of which a Recital was given by Dr. Reynolds, organist of St. Michael's, Cornhill. A second Recital was given by Dr. Reynolds on the following Sunday afternoon, the 11th ult. The programme of the first Recital included a Sonata in A minor, specially written for the occasion by the performer.

GEORGETOWN, BRITISH GUIANA.—At a Recital of sacred music on June 27, at St. Philip's Church, excellent performances were given of Pergolesi's "Stabat Mater" and Stainer's "Daughter of Jairus." The soloists in the former work were Mrs. James, Mrs. Vyfhuis, and Miss E. Griffin; and in the latter, Mrs. White, Mr. A. Collier, and Mr. W. van Eeden. Mr. C. W. Anderson led the orchestra, Miss Vyfhuis and Mr. Nusum presided respectively at the pianoforte and organ, and Mr. Colbeck conducted.

GRASSENDALE, LIVERPOOL.—An Organ Recital was given by Mr. Robert W. Pringle (organist of Hawarden Parish Church), at St. Mary's Church, Grassendale, on Sunday, the 18th ult. The programme consisted of the following: Overture ("Samson"), Handel; Larghetto, S. S. Wesley; St. Ann's Fugue, Bach; Andante, Batiste; Concerto in B flat, Handel. Mr. Williams was the vocalist.

HONG KONG.—Mr. C. F. A. Sangster, on the occasion of his retirement from the post of organist to St. John's Cathedral, was presented by the choir and congregation, on June 7, with addresses and a piece of plate, in recognition of his faithful service of the past thirty-five years.

LEAMINGTON.—An attractive Organ Recital was given, on the 8th ult., by Mr. Clarence Eddy, in the Parish Church.

MALVERN, VICTORIA, AUSTRALIA.—The Choral Society gave its third Subscription Concert of the present season in the local Shire Hall, on June 13, in the presence of a large audience. The chief choral works performed were Mendelssohn's unfinished opera "Loreley" and Jensen's "Feast of Adonis," Miss Sara Lewis singing the solo music allotted to Leonore in "Loreley." Miss Alice Daish contributed two pianoforte solos, Mr. A. Zelman, jun., played Sarasate's Spanish Dance, No. 8, in D, and Mr. J. P. Clarke sang Sullivan's "Thou'rt passing hence." The Society also gave a good rendering of the choral march "Hail, bright abode," from Wagner's "Tannhäuser," and "The Great God Pan" (Farebrother), as well as two short choruses from "William Tell." Mr. J. P. Clarke was an efficient accompanist and Mr. J. Hasler conducted. It is proposed to give the next Concert about the end of the present month, when Gade's "Crusaders" will be repeated.

PORT ELIZABETH, AFRICA.—The new Glee and Madrigal Society, under the conductorship of Mr. Percival Quarterman, gave its first Concert, on July 23, in the Town Hall. The choir consisted of some thirty vocalists, who gave commendable renderings of various choral pieces, including "When winds breathe soft" (Webbe), "Awake, Æolian Lyre" (Danby), "Lady, arise!" (Costa), "O Gladsome Light" from Sullivan's "Golden Legend," and Bishop's glee, "Now tramp o'er moss and fell," the solo in the last-named being sung by Miss J. Daly. Mr. F. E. Geoghegan also sang the solo part in the cavatina with chorus, "Hasten, ye Druids," from Bellini's "Norma." The instrumental pieces, played by Mr. Quarterman's select orchestra, included the first performance of "Un chanson d'amour," by the Concert-giver, which was encored.

WELLINGTON, NEW ZEALAND.—The attractive and excellent Organ Recitals at St. Peter's Church were resumed on June 27, when the programme was devoted to excerpts from the compositions of Spohr, and largely consisted of selections from "The Last Judgment." Mr. T. Tallis Trimmell was the organist, and the solo vocalists were Mrs. Richards and Messrs. H. Wright, H. L. Castle, E. F. Pollock, A. Clothier, and F. J. Richards.

ORGAN APPOINTMENTS.—Mr. Henry R. Thompson, to St. Mary's Church, Leyton.—Mr. J. W. Hankins, jun., to Chaldon Parish Church, Surrey.—Mr. James E. Reid, Organist and Choirmaster to the Parish Church, Hydro, Forbes, N.B.—Mr. Mowbray P. Balme, to Limehouse Parish Church.—Mr. Ernest H. "It is refreshing, after wading through countless specimens of the ordinary British ballad, to come across a set of songs so artistic in design as those contained in the album labelled 'Seven Songs,' by Sir John Stainer. . . . Amateurs on the look-out for something really good may confidently be recommended to devote their attention to these admirable songs."—Morning Post.

FIRST STEPS

AT THE

PIANOFORTE

BY

FRANCESCO BERGER.

Price Two Shillings and Sixpence.
In Paper Boards, Three Shillings.

PREFACE.

This "Elementary Primer for the Pianoforte" aims at supplying "beginners" with a "Method" to be used from end to end in the order in which it is compiled.

Although "Pianoforte Instructors" are as numerous as the sands of the sea, I claim for this one that it is quite original not only in its progressive order, but also in the language employed.

Convinced that it is worse than useless to crowd a child's mind with words which, to that child, convey no meaning, I have studiously used only such words as a child with moderate intelligence can be expected to understand.

The student must, before attempting to play, acquire a correct and unerring mental picture of the arrangement of the keyboard.

Counting aloud should become a habit from the very first finger-exercises.

The customary "Household melodies" have been carefully avoided, because I confidently believe that, while engaged on a familiar melody, the student is unconsciously playing more or less "by ear," even correcting his own errors that way—instead of "reading" (deciphering) every note of the Piece.

Diatonic Scales are not included. Till the student is sufficiently advanced to be taught the construction of major and minor scales, he is better without "scales" at all; and it does not come within the scope of an "Elementary Primer" to teach all that "the Scales" imply.

Some Scale-passages, however, with no necessary tonality, are included.

The so-called "English" fingering has been discarded in favour of the more universal "foreign" fingering.

FRANCESCO BERGER.

"It is hardly needful to say that Mr. F. Berger's work is well and thoughtfully done. It ought to prove of great service to teachers in the troublesome first months of children's studies. All difficulties are so gradually introduced and so clearly explained that the book should be widely adopted. A commendable feature is the employment of larger type, both of letterpress and music, to make important points stand out clearly before the eye. An excellent supplement to the 'First Steps' will be found in 'Eighteen little Pieces for the Pianoforte,' given to us by the same author and publishers. These are characteristic little genre pieces, not unlike Schumann's 'Kinderszenen' in plan, but much simpler; in fact, really children's pieces. They are all tuneful, but educational at the same time, and will form useful little studies in phrasing and expression."—Musical News.

"The special features of this work are its extreme simplicity and the clearness with which everything is explained to the young student. Indeed, a child of ordinary intelligence might almost learn the rudiments without other aid than the Primer, and in any event the book will be of the greatest assistance to the governess or other teacher."—Daily News.

"The 'Primer' aims at extreme simplicity of language and reference, at careful logical sequence, and at the avoidance of all theory not reasonably necessary of explanation in making actual practice intelligible. Its simplicity will make it pleasing in the young pupils' own hands, and will at the same time convey many useful hints to the teachers using it. The exercises are extremely well arranged, and they constitute, perhaps, the most valuable part of the practical treatise."—Manchester Courier.

"The author, who is an authority on imparting musical knowledge to young children, has used a method that seems well within the comprehension of those for whom it is written. We very much prefer it to the numerous pictorial instructors that have lately come into our hands. Mr. Berger's book seems to be as clear an exposition of the rudiments of music as any human being could make them. Indeed, it appears to us that if a child cannot grasp so lucid an arrangement, then it is certain his or her studies have been prematurely begun."—Musical Standard.

NOTE.—The custom which prevails in schools of allowing pupils to play in unison, to the practical exclusion of part-playing, has suggested the need of such pieces as are contained in these volumes; and it is hoped that, besides providing for the want that is felt, they will also tend to modify the custom.—GEORGE CALKIN.

ORATORIOS

GEO. SHINN, MUS. BAC., CANTAB.

SUITABLE FOR CONCERT-ROOM OR CHURCH.

The following Works contain many effective Solos and Choruses of moderate difficulty, and will take about an hour and a half in performance.

Twelfth Thousand.

THE CAPTIVES OF BABYLON.

Price 2s.; paper boards, 2s. 6d.; cloth, 3s. 6d.; Sol-fa, 1s.

"In our judgment no better work of the kind has yet been published. It is brimful of pretty melodies, and the harmonic effects show the skill of a painstaking and talented musician."—Free Methodist.

"The libretto is well chosen, and forms a good base whereon to compose a first-rate work. With regard to the music we feel we can hardly do it justice. . . . Where all is so good it is difficult to mention any special numbers."—United Service Gazette.

LAZARUS OF BETHANY.

Price 2s.; paper boards, 2s. 6d.; cloth, 3s. 6d.; Sol-fa, 1s.

"Mr. Shinn is entitled to warm praise for his Oratorio, since it is obviously written to provide choirs of moderate capabilities with a work not too long, not too difficult, but with melodious and musician-like, and, above all, faithful in its representation of the dramatic incidents of its sacred narrative. Upon all these grounds Mr. Shinn can claim a success."—The Keyboard.

"The work contains some remarkably well-written solos and choruses. There are two exquisite bass solos, and a quartet, 'Blessed are the dead,' is a lovely piece of part-writing. The concluding fugue, 'Hallelujah Amen,' is a fitting climax to the work."—Sussex Daily News.

BRUCE STEANE'S CANTATA THE ASCENSION.

COURT CIRCULAR.

On Wednesday evening, May 22, 1895, Mr. Bruce Steane's admirable new sacred cantata, "The Ascension," received its first public rendition under the auspices of the Norwood and District Choral Society. The cantata, which is a most musically, and, indeed, in every way notable composition, achieved a most unequalled success, and should be joyfully hailed as an addition to our high-class Church festival music. "The Ascension" of Mr. Bruce Steane should be chosen for interpretation by the conductors of great festivals like those of Leeds, Birmingham, or "The Three Choirs," for of such the work is quite worthy. Mr. Steane must be awarded high praise for the splendid tone-poem he has given to the world; and it may be regarded as quite a remarkable accession to the list of religious musical works available for use in Britain.

NORWOOD PRESS.

In "The Ascension" the Bible narrative has been judiciously wedded to music of a high order, some extremely pretty orchestral parts being introduced. The composer has been eminently successful with the choruses, which increase in interest and effectiveness as the work proceeds, finally culminating in a grand burst of harmony, "Glory be to God on high." Hardly had the last notes of the concluding chorus died away when the audience burst into loud applause, which was renewed with even greater enthusiasm as the composer appeared on the platform in response.

DAILY CHRONICLE.

Bruce Steane's "Ascension" is a work that is instinct with devotional spirit and sound musicianship. It has all the elements of popularity, and contains nothing derogatory either to art or to religion.

CHURCH TIMES.

An excellent cantata is "The Ascension" by Bruce Steane. The whole work is full of vigorous music, having several admirable airs for tenor and soprano, and all the choruses are capital. The words have been selected by the Rev. Gresham F. Gillett from the Holy Scriptures and from other sources in a very careful and praiseworthy manner.

LYOUD'S NEWS.

A cantata as satisfactory to religious feeling as it is grateful to the ear is Mr. Bruce Steane's "The Ascension." It has sustained melodious passages that command attention, whilst the devotional spirit is maintained throughout. The choruses are well written but at no point difficult. "The Ascension" deserves to become one of the most popular of Church cantatas.

MUSICAL NEWS.

Mr. Steane's music is throughout tuneful and musically, grateful to vocalists and effectively scored. We heartily commend this cantata to the notice of choirmasters.

MUSICAL STANDARD.

Mr. Bruce Steane's sacred cantata "The Ascension" is a capably written, meritorious work.

ALFRED R. GAUL'S CANTATAS.

* UNA

4TH AND 5TH THOUSAND.

PRODUCED AT THE NORWICH MUSICAL FESTIVAL,
OCTOBER 4, 1893."Una' is quite one of his best."—Musical Standard.

"The result, in the present case, leaves no doubt that into all the places which know his previous compositions 'Una' will find a way and become as much a favourite as its forerunners. . . . Mr. Gaul considers before all things the elegance and symmetry of his melodic phrases."—Musical Times.

"We believe that Mr. Gaul has attained greater popularity with small English provincial choral societies than any other composer, living or dead."—London Daily Graphic.

† THE TEN VIRGINS

Third Edition. Seventh and Eighth Thousand.

This Edition contains the additional Soprano air "Sun of my Soul."

"The work will certainly go through Saxondom in the wake of its predecessors from the same pen."—London Daily Telegraph.

"Must attain popularity wherever heard. Infinitely superior to any previous effort of the composer."—Liverpool Daily Courier.

"A distinct advance upon any of its predecessors."—Birmingham Daily Post.

"That 'The Ten Virgins' is a much finer work than the everywhere favourite 'Holy City' we have no doubt whatever."—Birmingham Daily Gazette.

PRODUCED WITH THE UTMOST SUCCESS BY THE
BIRMINGHAM FESTIVAL CHORAL SOCIETY.

* JOAN OF ARC

Staff Edition. Sixteenth to Twentieth Thousand.

"The Exeter Oratorio Society last night achieved a brilliant success, and it may safely be said, without fear of exaggeration, that never before have they performed a work more satisfactory to themselves or more interesting to the audience than 'Joan of Arc.'"—Western Times.

"One of the most delightful Concerts ever given by the South Shields Choral Society was that of last evening, when the principal piece was 'Joan of Arc.' We cannot speak too highly of Mr. Gaul's work, which is of the most interesting description, and will doubtless soon be a favourite with choral societies."—Shields Daily News.

5TH AND 6TH THOUSAND.

PRODUCED AT THE CRYSTAL PALACE, JULY 9, 1892.

† ISRAEL IN THE WILDERNESS

"The work was given under Mr. Gaul's own direction by some 3,000 singers, accompanied by the Palace orchestra. Mr. Gaul has presented in no previous work better characteristics or more successful efforts than are to be found in 'Israel in the Wilderness.' The popular composer was enthusiastically cheered at the close of the performance."—Musical News.

The above Cantatas have been specially planned to meet the requirements of Musical Societies, the greater portion being choral.

Price, paper cover, 2s. 6d.; paper boards, 3s.; cloth, gilt, 4s.; Tonic Sol-fa, 1s.; vocal parts, each 1s. Words only, * 7s. 6d.; † 5s. per 100.

OF

J. F. BRIDGE, MUS. DOC., OXON., AND JAMES HIGGS, MUS. BAC., OXON.

IN this, the first complete English Edition of John Sebastian Bach's Organ Works (the Chorale Preludes excepted), the distribution of the parts between the hands is, in all doubtful cases, clearly indicated by the notes that are to be performed by the right hand being printed on the upper of the two manual staves, while the notes that are to be played by the left hand will be found on the lower of the two manual staves. As far as possible care has been taken not needlessly to divide a middle part between the two hands when it can be conveniently performed by one hand continuously. The text has been carefully collated with former Editions, but generally where it differs from Griepenkerl's reading (Peters) it will be found to agree with the more recent Edition of the German Bach Society. Much thought has been given to secure convenient points for turning over, a matter of considerable importance to the performer. (See the "Great" G minor and the "St. Ann's" Fugues.) Suggestions as to the rate of performance and general treatment are given without encumbering the page with too detailed directions, and it is hoped the work in its complete form will be found a boon to the earnest Organ Student.

MR. BATES' SOLO BOYS.

Mr. BATES (Principal of the London Training School for Chorists, Director of the Choir of Christ Church, Lancaster Gate) has Solo Boys available for Oratorios, Festival Services, Organ Recitals, Concerts, &c.

Mr. BATES' boys hold positions as Soloists at St. Mary's, Stoke Newington; St. Peter's, Kensington; St. Peter's, Paddington; Hampstead Parish Church; Bencher's Chapel, Gray's Inn; St. Thomas's, North Kensington; St. Matthew's, Bayswater; St. Matthew's, Marylebone; Christ Church, Lancaster Gate.

The following are some of Mr. Bates' Solo Boys' most recent Press Opinions:—

ELI.—"The boy who took the part of Samuel was a signal success, his sweet melodious voice completely took the audience by storm."—Bedford and County Record.HYMN OF PRAISE.—"The solos and duet were excellently sung by two of Mr. Bates' boys. Their style and interpretation are exceptional."—Folkestone Herald.REDEMPTION.—"While my watch" was sung with intense feeling, and "From Thy love as a Father" with exceptional sweetness and effect."—West London Indicator.LAST JUDGMENT.—"Sustained treble solos in a most accomplished manner."—Hampstead and Highgate Express."The boy's full, well-trained, and exquisitely sweet voice charmed all who heard him."—Hereford Mercury.STABAT MATER.—"The success of the evening was the duet 'Quis est Homo.' The air with the accompanying chorus, 'Inflammas et accensus,' once more roused the assembly to enthusiasm, and had to be repeated."—East London Advertiser.GALLIA AND HEAR MY PRAYER.—"The lad has a voice of singular beauty and range, and his phrasing is marked by great intelligence."—Folkestone Herald.GOUNOD'S FAUST.—"The boy took the character of Siebel, and his charming voice was heard with telling effect in the Cantata, 'Evening bravely and sweetly tell,' the 'Flower song,' and the romance 'When all was young and pleasant.'"—East London Observer.SONGS.—"Unusually large audiences attended the Concerts at Plymouth Guildhall on Saturday, when a London boy soprano was the soloist. He possesses a highly trained voice of singular purity and sweetness, and each song was loudly encored."—Western Morning Times.SELECTIONS.—"Handel's 'Angels ever bright and fair' was sung with exceedingly fine effect, and in his later contribution, 'My heart ever faithful' (Bach), the youthful singer enraptured his listeners with his melodious voice and perfect articulation."—Kilburn Times.SELECTIONS.—"The youthful soloist possesses a sweet voice, whilst his enunciation and expression denoted culture and artistic perception of a high order."—Enfield and Tottenham Observer.

With this Number is presented gratis an Extra Supplement, consisting of a Part-Song, "Full fathom five," by Charles Wood.

THE MUSICAL TIMES

AND SINGING-CLASS CIRCULAR.

OCTOBER 1, 1895.

JEALOUSY AND GENIUS.

It is to be feared that the jealousy which, with some honourable exceptions, is so characteristic of the genus irritabile of musicians, is ingrained in the artistic temperament. Certain it is that this resentment of rivalry is to be found even in the earliest ages, and plays a notable part in Greek mythology. Apollo, we need hardly remind our readers, was quite the first virtuoso of his time. We may remark parenthetically that he is generally represented with long hair, and, doubtless, set the fashion adopted by celebrated instrumentalists down to the present day. Apollo's position was so well established that he might have been supposed to care little what provincial musical critics said about his performances. But, unfortunately, this was not so. A certain Phrygian millionaire, Midas by name, who rather fancied himself as a patron of the arts, had the imprudence to assert that Pan was superior to Apollo in singing and playing upon the flute. What probably annoyed Apollo so much in this comparison was the fact that, whereas he was a singularly handsome specimen of manly beauty, Pan was a monster in appearance, his complexion being ruddy, his nose flat, and his legs, tail, and feet those of a goat. Anyhow, Apollo was so indignant at Midas's remarks that he then and there changed his ears into those of an ass, to show his ignorance and stupidity. Apollo's behaviour in the famous case of Marsyas was even more indefensible. Marsyas was the Taffanel of ancient Phrygia, where he enjoyed such a reputation for his performances on the flute that he was generally considered to have been the inventor of it. There is another story, it is true, of his finding the instrument when Minerva had thrown it aside on account of the distortion of her face when she played upon it, a proceeding which will doubtless seem very childish to the ladies who affect wood-wind instruments in our own days. Anyhow, Marsyas carried his virtuosity to such a pitch that he finally challenged Apollo to a trial of his skill as a musician. The god accepted, and an Eisteddfod was held at Nysa, at which the Nine Muses acted as adjudicators. The result was, of course, a foregone conclusion, though even the supporters of Apollo admitted that the victory long hung in the balance. But Apollo, we regret to say, was not content with his success, for he promptly seized his unfortunate antagonist, tied him to a tree and flayed him alive. The story that it had been mutually agreed upon beforehand that whoever was defeated should be flayed by the conqueror was obviously fabricated by Apollo to palliate his conduct. But he never denied having carried out this savage act of vengeance on his inoffensive confrère, and we read that at Marsyas's birthplace his skin "was suspended in the public place in the form of a bladder or football." Thus the voracious and circumstantial Lemprière, who omits to mention whether the football was of the Rugby or Association form.

We have been at pains to set forth this melancholy history at some length, since it serves to show that even in the golden age, when the gods mingled openly with mankind, artistic rivalry was apt, at times, to disintegrate the equanimity of the most enlightened social circles. It is pleasant to think that, degenerate though Max Nordau would regard us in many ways, we do not now proceed to such extreme measures as those adopted by Apollo in the case of his unlucky rival. Illustrious performers do not flay their illustrious colleagues themselves; they leave that to the critics who, it must be admitted, with a few exceptions, acquit themselves of the task with a good deal more tenderness and consideration for their victims than was exhibited by their predecessors. And when public competition is engaged in, as at the Welsh Eisteddfodau, it is no longer the defeated candidates who need fear for their skins. It is the adjudicators, like the football referees, who have much more cause for alarm lest the dissatisfaction of the populace should vent itself in personal violence. Now when the Nine Muses formed the jury Lemprière does not mention that they displayed the slightest anxiety as to the manner in which the populace would accept their verdict. It will be admitted, then, that in their mutual attitude towards each other the virtuosi of to-day display a humaner spirit than in the days of Apollo and Marsyas. But it would be idle to contend that jealousy no longer exists. It is stated in a recent work on the prima donna that "the most adorable persons are sometimes slightly treacherous, and the prima donna, in her dislike of rivalry, resembles other artists. The great instrumental virtuoso can no more brook successful competition than can the eminent vocalist." This statement we shall examine later on. Meantime we may recall the anecdote quoted in the same work of a pianist who once went to the concert of a rival, and taking his seat in the front row applauded with enthusiasm all the most surprising passages in his rival's most difficult pieces. He did not, however, as he afterwards explained, applaud the best executed passages, but only those in which he detected false notes! Both of these pianists are dead; but whereas the critical one, Leopold de Meyer, is forgotten, the inaccurate performer, Rubinstein, is not likely soon to pass into oblivion. And Rubinstein, we may add, certainly showed no jealousy where his rival executants were concerned. He is reported to have said of Liszt that in comparison with him he (Rubinstein) and all other pianists were mere wood-choppers; and in his interesting dialogue on "Music and Musicians" describes him as "unsurpassed and unsurpassable." But then it must be added that Rubinstein had the poorest possible opinion of Liszt as a composer.

On the whole, we are inclined to think that instrumentalists are capable of greater generosity in their appreciation of the talents of a rival than vocalists. The writer has constantly observed Señor Sarasate applauding vigorously at concerts given by other violinists. He has dedicated one of his most ambitious compositions to Joachim, who, in his turn, is known to cherish the liveliest admiration for the "fascinating Spanish fiddler" as he has called him. This is as it should be, and contrasts very agreeably with the gratuitous and ill-mannerly disparagement of the great German violinist recently indulged in by a former pupil of his, who has of late years achieved considerable success as a transcendental technician. But to the best of our belief no instance is on record of an operatic tenor who was on intimate or even cordial terms with another tenor. It is possible for a tenor to be enthusiastic about a bass, or for a soprano to admire a contralto. Indeed, we believe that instances might be possibly found of a dramatic soprano sincerely appreciating the talent of a light bravura singer. But to expect a tenor to love a tenor is to expect too much of frail human nature. Indeed, it has often seemed to us a merciful dispensation of Providence that there never have been a brace of celebrated tenors who were brothers. Had such a pair existed, we feel certain that the inevitable rivalry would have led to some terrible domestic tragedy, say a duel, in which the only weapon allowed was the ut de poitrine. Happily, this situation has never yet arisen. As for the prime donne, there is the remarkable case of Malibran and Pauline Viardot-Garcia, though the latter was only fifteen at her sister's death. Still Malibran, as M. Legouv  tells us, had already foretold her younger sister's brilliant success. But then there was only one Malibran and only one Viardot-Garcia, both of them women of genius, and both void of the pettinesses of prima-donna-dom.

SLAVONIC MUSIC.

THE prominent position which of late years Slavonic music has attained in all parts of Europe is one of the most striking features of modern musical progress. Its popularity is still increasing, and the influence its form and idioms are exerting over Western composers is daily becoming more obvious. This in itself is remarkable, for it is rare that the spirit of the East dictates to the spirit of the West. Although the term Slavonic is generally applied to Polish, Bohemian, Russian, and Hungarian composers, of which the most representative to the majority of English musical people are severally Chopin, Dvor k, T chaikowsky, and Liszt, it should not be forgotten that the national style of each possesses clearly defined individuality. Particularly is this the case with the Hungarian, owing to that tongue having nothing in common with the Indo-Germanic languages. The above-mentioned composers may be said to have been the chief channels by which the stream of the music of Eastern Europe has flowed to us. Other composers whose writings promise to cultivate popular taste for this music are Smetana, C sar Cui, Borodin, Glazounoff. Now no school of art work obtains wide acceptance unless it expresses the common mode of thought of its period or comes forth with the fascination peculiar to a new development arising from exhaustion of previous methods. Slavonic music may be said to possess both these attractive attributes. Liszt broke down the strict confines of accepted forms, which by long use, and it may be added abuse, had produced conventionality; and the new Russian School expresses in a remarkable manner the intensity and peculiar individuality of modern thought. Few people, however, are aware of the struggle that this has cost many earnest and enthusiastic Slavonic composers. It is but recently that the symphonic poem has been widely accepted, and the new Russian school of music met for many years with the liveliest opposition from all "the powers that were." We are apt to look upon this latter music as a new spirit coming to us from a strange land where it had for ages past been known and honoured. But it is not so. In 1856 two enthusiastic young musicians met accidentally in St. Petersburg. They were C sar Cui and Balakireff. "Let us found a new and more rational school of Russian music," they said. They were quickly joined by Rymiski-Korsakoff, the writer of descriptive songs, rich alike in colour and accompaniment; by Borodin, given to Oriental themes and restless changes of rhythm; and by Moussorgsky, whose style is declamatory and brusque. A goodly fighting company—and they had to fight. Said the pedants, "Who are these that preach to us? Soldiers, sailors, professors of chemistry—amateurs! Let us fall upon and utterly destroy them." But although they were assailed on all sides and suffered many defeats, they received such reinforcements that they were enabled to finally gain public esteem. Thus were spent the early years of the new Russian School of Music, a school that is not yet forty years old. For the causes of its acceptance by ourselves it is necessary to review social developments at home.

It has been said that the inventor of the wheel altered the face of the earth, and certainly the multiplication of wheels, combined with the subjugation of electricity, have, by the marvellously increased means of intercourse thus afforded, gone far to remove the cloak of dignified reserve with which we have been wont to envelop our individuality. Again, the majority of scientific discoveries having chiefly resulted from elaborate and subtle analysis, the wider application of this principle followed as a natural consequence until complete satisfaction in "anything that is in heaven above, or in the earth beneath, or in the waters under the earth" would to-day seem impossible till it has been dissected and reduced to its component parts. Human motives and mental activity have been submitted to the same method of treatment as stones and gases. Having, as far as possible, pulled all things to pieces, the next step that naturally occurred to the ingenuity of man was to put them together again in an abnormal manner. In chemistry the results not infrequently departed into space with disconcerting celerity; in literature a flood of heroes and heroines were created, the like no sun has ever smiled upon—at least, we hope so. The chief result on the masses of all this hurrying to and fro, and the increased knowledge of good and evil, has been a keener appreciation and study of the enjoyments of life and an increasing regard for the claims of individuality. No little of the popularity now enjoyed by Bizet's "Carmen," and other modern operas too well-known to need mention, is largely traceable to this cause. Our novels, our plays, our poems are all based upon characterisation. The epic poem is neglected for the glorification of the particle and the greatest interest is aroused by the portrayal of the idiosyncrasies of the human mind—mad or otherwise. Now the chief feature of Slavonic music is the powerful manner in which it expresses the rapid fluctuations of mental excitement. This it does by the ardent expression and exaggerated accentuation of emotional phases. Its love is wild passion, its desire is unutterable yearning. Its exaltation is frenzy, its despondency is hopeless despair. The cry of the animal is heard in its speech, and barbaric splendour characterises the glow of its colouring. In short, it is, as a modern poet has written, "a music mounting in a shaft of fire," and exactly of the kind which arrests the attention of the lover of strong characterisation.

This intensity of what may be termed the musical expression of emotionalism is most marked in Hungarian music, which presents many distinct and unique features. The causes of this are as peculiar as they are complex. Racially the people of Eastern Europe present an extraordinary mixture. To quote Professor Huxley: "The blonde broad-heads of Poland and West Russia form part of a people who, when they made their first appearance in history, occupied the marshy plains imperfectly drained by the Vistula on the West, the Duna on the North, and the Dnieper and Bug on the South. They were known to their neighbours as Wends, and among themselves as Serbs and Slavs. . . From very early times they have been a mixed race, for their country lies between that of the tall blonde long-heads on the North, that of the short brunette broad-heads of the European type on the West, and that of the short brunette broad-heads of the Asiatic type on the East; and throughout their history they have either thrust themselves among their neighbours or have been over-run and trampled down by them. Gauls and Goths have traversed their country on their way to the East and South; Finno-Tartaric people, on their way to the West, have not only done the like, but have held them in subjection for centuries." In the ninth century, what was subsequently known as Hungary was dominated by the Magyars, a Turanian people, and it would appear that it is to these Magyars that the Hungarians of to-day owe the distinctiveness of their language, and, consequently, that of their folk-songs. These, rhythmically, are totally different from those of all other European nations. In this respect Hungarian music stands by itself. In the fifteenth century bands of gipsies, another Eastern people, probably of Semitic origin, settled in Hungary; but it is only within the last hundred years that they replaced the old Hungarian minstrels and became the people's musicians. When once, however, the gipsies had discovered this means of gaining the favour of their hosts they cultivated it with remarkable success, and at the same time decorated the ancient folk-tunes with elaborate arabesque kind of ornamentations of Eastern character. The rhythmic characteristics of a nation's music are almost wholly derived from the accentuation of its language. In Hungarian the accents are not only more numerous and varied than in any European tongue, but they are distinct from those common to Indo-Germanic languages, and belong exclusively to the Ural-Altairic family. Hence the rhythm forms one of the most distinguishable features of Hungarian music. But there is another and still more remarkable peculiarity possessed by Hungarian music. Mr. Korbay in his recent lectures, noticed in these columns in May last, drew a graphic picture of the method pursued by the gipsy instrumentalists in Hungary. In other European countries executants are expected, and are at least supposed, to endeavour to express the sentiment of the composer; but in Hungary it would appear that the musician's success depends upon his ability to portray the emotions of his listener. Hence the applicability of their song—

Play on, gipsy, play on always,
Sad and sadder, ever more.
For thy music in mine eyes look,
My pale face shall be thy score.

The task of the gipsy is of course greatly facilitated by the melodies played being well known folk-songs, not only reminiscent of an underlying text, but probably also associated with historical and domestic events. Still the peculiarity of the procedure is very remarkable and, in fact, unique. Imagine one of our popular conductors—say, Sir Alexander Mackenzie—violin at chin, playing “Robin Adair” to the improvised accompaniment of the Philharmonic orchestra; subsequently trying the effect on his audience of other melodies until pocket-handkerchiefs ascended to glistening eyes, perchance at the strains of “Home, sweet home”; whereupon the music would become more impassioned, grow wilder than a student's first symphonic poem, more frenzied than a poet's dream, until players and listeners had acted and re-acted upon each other till both were in a like state of emotional delirium. This picture may surpass the imaginative power of some, but, practically, such is the method pursued in Hungary to-day; and, moreover, that in which is to be seen the origin of the swift changes of sentiment that characterise what is termed the Hungarian School of Music. It is important that this should be realised just now, because what may be called the Hungarian style has caught the public ear and in no small degree is influencing our composers. Such influence is to be welcomed in so far as it will result in the striving for, and power of, greater intensity of expression; but at the same time it should be remembered that the national instincts of the Hungarian predispose him to appeal to what are commonly known as emotional rather than intellectual factors, and that consequently any sacrifice is to him justifiable if it produces sensory excitement in his listeners. To define what is intellectual or sensuous in music is impossible, because even in the simplest music both elements are blended in inextricable embrace, and because each will acquire prominence according to the temperament and capacities of the listener. But the composer knows, or should know, the intellectual value of his work, and which element preponderates. The magician knows the ingredients of the incense he uses at his incantations, and the nature of the enchantment his spell will cast over the predisposed. The rapid alternations of sentiment and tempo of Hungarian music point clearly to its source. It is the nature of emotional states to generate and to be followed by their opposites, whereas intellectual progress is achieved by associative development. The two procedures are reflected in a Hungarian rhapsody and a Beethoven symphony. The cause of the rapid changes of phases of sensuous excitement is not far to seek. All pleasurable emotions caused merely by the action of the sensory nerves are evanescent, because these nerves quickly become exhausted and, in some cases, after a brief period, incapable of performing their functions. The musk plant seems to emit no scent after it has been once smelt; the eye quickly wearies of the most beautiful colour; the ear, more delicate than all, however charmed with a fine tone, soon loses all pleasure in it. Hence music, in which the sensory element dominates the intellectual, can only sustain the interest of the listener by rapid changes of sentiment or rhythm and vivid contrasts of tone. The habit of analysis, now so widespread, is conducive to the isolation and exaggeration of factors which are designed to act, and can only act perfectly in union with each other. We are too apt, like little Jack Horner, to sit in a corner and pull out a plum and say what a great boy am I. The plum may be very beautiful, and the capability to pull it out most meritorious; but for all that it was most satisfactory when in its proper environment. In short, the intellectual and sensory perceptions are so intimately and perfectly entwined in our nature that they cannot be appealed to singly or with individual predominance with satisfactory results. By all means let us absorb the emotional intensity of Slavonic, and its important and distinctive branch, Hungarian music; but let us submit it to rational control, lest in its wild frenzy it should turn and rend from us those intellectual enjoyments upon which is based the immortality of the works of our great tone poets.

SOME MUSICAL EXPERIENCES IN ITALY.

ON December 17, 1891, I found myself in the famous Duomo of Milan. High Mass was in progress, to which I listened for some time. The singing was good, and the composition reminded me of the style of Pergolesi. The plain-song portions were sung without accompaniment. Wishing to learn something of the Ambrosian Chant, I made enquiries in the Cathedral, and was taken to the vestry, and from there sent in charge of an old verger to the office of the Musica Sacra. Here I was able to get one or two pieces of Ambrosian music, but only a few scraps are published. One of the proprietors of the Musica Sacra (who I afterwards heard was Count Lurani) explained to me that the music, as published by them, was taken from the original MSS.; but that the chant, as sung at the Cathedral, was full of modern alterations, chiefly, of course, prunings of the very elaborate vocalises, &c. He sang a few examples in order to show me how different was the modern practice from the written song version. He then gave me a letter of introduction to the Canon Marco Magistretti, the "master of the sacred ceremonies" at the Cathedral, asking him to show me some MSS. Armed with this, I was conducted by my old verger back to the Cathedral, and he was evidently extremely proud of his mission, for, as he strutted in front of me through the building, he told everybody he saw, in a stage whisper, that he was taking me "al Magistretti."

The Canon dwells in the cloisters. I found him most agreeable and polite. He at once produced an Antiphony and Gradual of the twelfth century and others of the fourteenth, and explained some of the differences between the Ambrosian and Roman "uses," besides singing portions of the ancient and modern versions to me. He compared the printed music that I had brought with the MSS., and showed me that it was perfectly correct.

On the following day I went to St. Bartolomeo to try the organ, but it was not much of an instrument. It had two manuals, and some of the soft stops were of good quality, but the full organ was very poor and harsh. It had a full compass of pedals, and while both my feet were employed someone standing by remarked that there was also a crescendo pedal, which I did not appear to have noticed, and he forthwith put his foot upon the swell pedal and began pumping up and down with remarkable energy. As the whole, or nearly the whole organ was enclosed in the swell box, the effect may be imagined.

The next day being Sunday, I made an attempt to hear a function at St. Carlo Borromeo; but as no one seemed to know when it was going to commence, I got there an hour too early. Not wishing to waste any of my precious time, I hurried off to the Cathedral, and, acting on advice previously given me, made my way to seats inside the portion answering to the "choir" of an English Cathedral. This was a mistake, for the musical portion of the service was soon over, and I found there was no possibility of escape from a sermon of nearly an hour's length, addressed to an enormous crowd of the working classes. The organ at the Cathedral seemed to me poor. The choir is a large one and is placed behind the altar, out of sight. I thought the voices rather harsh and forced, and they were not always in tune; but they certainly made up in energy for any other failing.

Having been detained by the sermon, I was too late for the beginning of the function at St. Carlo, and only arrived in time for its latter portion, which consisted of a procession of women in black carrying lighted tapers, preceded by a man in red clothes, walking backwards. After a lively jig, full of consecutives and other atrocities, had been played on a very poor organ, a Litany was chanted by the processionists and the congregation. As they approached the altar the organ came in with full power, the congregation got mixed, and there was a fearful shindy; then came a silence for a time, a little more music, and it was over.

I went to see San Ambrogio, a beautiful old church on the site of a temple of Bacchus. A popular service was going on, with hundreds of children singing a kind of Salvation Army Litany in three-four time. The choir sang in thirds throughout; there was no bass, and the organ occasionally joined in, following at a respectful distance, from one beat to half-a-bar behind, and the noise was excruciating. To crown all, the full power of the organ was suddenly put on, fearfully out of tune (nearly all Italian organs are!) and the people singing their loudest in all sorts of tempi. I could no longer stand it and fled back to the Cathedral, where I found a really fine service in progress, with several excellent solo singers and the organ really well played. One of the basses was particularly good. The church was nearly dark, the only lights being in the choir.

My next stay was at Bologna, where I presented an introduction to Signor Martucci, the director of the Liceo, who, after politely showing me over the building (in one room of which I heard an organ pupil playing Bach's D major Fugue excellently), handed me over to the Librarian. The library had been recently catalogued and arranged, and I was shown several of its treasures, my attention being chiefly attracted by a beautifully illuminated MS. collection of the music of Dufay, Binchois, Romani, &c., made by Doni. Since then, MSS. of compositions by English composers of the fifteenth century, of considerable historical importance, have been found in this library.

In the Museo Civico there is an excellent little collection of musical instruments, containing, among other curiosities, a five-fold flute, the pipes of which are of different lengths, but are all played at the same time by one performer; there is fortunately a means of closing one or more of the pipes at will. A description of this instrument is given by Kircher in his "Musurgia," p. 506. Bologna has the reputation of being the most really musical of Italian cities at the present day. It was here that "Lohengrin" was first received by an Italian audience.

The first music I heard in Florence was in the Church of the Annunciata. The Mass was a kind of pasticcio made up of extracts from various works—ranging from the “March of the Priests” in “Zauberflöte,” sung as a chorus and solo, to some kind of vulgar ballet-music. The choir and organ and a small orchestra were completely hidden behind the altar. The voices were nasal and out of tune, the priest being the chief offender. The Amens were invariably sung to a kind of quarter-tone instead of a semitone. The organ was mostly played at its full power, but on the rare occasions in which one heard the soft stops the quality was very good. The choir sang ff throughout, no attempt at light and shade was made, and there seemed to be a want of sympathy with the music on the part of the choir, who sang in a very perfunctory manner.

Besides the organ behind the altar, there were two more, placed one on each side of the nave, high up and to the West of the transepts. On one of these the concluding voluntary was played. It began something like this—

I did not stay to hear the rest.

The next day I went to the Duomo, where a space under the dome is partitioned off by marble balustrades and glass for the choir and clergy. I could see no organ, nor did I hear one in any subsequent visits. I can at once dismiss the music of the Florence Cathedral with Ruskin's perfectly justifiable description in “Mornings in Florence”: “Of bestial howling and entirely frantic vomiting up of hopelessly damned souls through their still carnal throats, I have heard more than, please God, I will ever endure the hearing of again in one of His summers.”

I visited several of the libraries at Florence. In the Bibliotheca Nazionale I was shown a MS. of Guido's “Micrologus,” containing pictures of saints; some of its musical characters, however, would require a magnifying glass to decipher—probably they had better eyes in ancient days than we have. I should like to say much about this book, but must pass on to the library of St. Lorenzo. Here there is a famous MS. Virgil, one of the oldest books in existence, it having belonged to T. R. Rufius Apronianus, who was Consul of Rome in 394 A.D. It is in excellent preservation and easy to read, the letters being for the most part Roman capitals similar to those used in modern print. There is a fac-simile in the British Museum made in the last century, but unfortunately the neumes which are found in the original, and which make it of great interest to musicians, are omitted in the fac-simile. At this library most of the books are chained to the desks, but the Virgil, owing to its enormous value, is kept in a glass case under lock and key. An introduction to the excellent librarian, Professor Biagi, procured me leave to have the book taken out of its case and brought to a private room, where I was allowed to thoroughly examine it. It is full of neumes, evidently added at a later date. Professor Biagi considers that they are intended to show the inflections of the voice in reading, and are not musical notes. This Virgil is an important link in the history of musical notation, for it helps to prove Pothier's theory that the neumes were originally merely accents, intended to show where the voice had to rise and fall for good declamation; and that not until much later did they become indications of fixed intervals. In the Church of St. Lorenzo I was permitted to go behind the altar and see the choir arrangements. The choir sit in two cages. There are three desks for the orchestra, and a small organ high up in the space usually occupied by the East window, but hidden by the altar. The plain-song is sung from huge MS. books placed on a lofty three-fold desk in the centre of the space, the notes being so large as to be legible from any portion of the choir. The books are held open by a leather strap, and when a page has to be turned a boy goes up a ladder, takes off the strap, and, after turning over, replaces it. This seems to be the arrangement in most of the Italian churches.

Herr Kraus kindly allowed me to see his famous collection of instruments; but the collection is so large that it would take weeks instead of a few hours to see it, and several volumes to describe it. There were six good sized rooms as full as they could hold. I was first taken to the violin room, and, finding I could play a little, Herr Kraus took out of their cases violins by the Amatis, Ruggerius, J. Guarnerius, Guadagnini, and many others, and wished me to try them all. There were about thirty; but after I had played on a dozen or so, I struck, and said I should like to see some of the other instruments.

In the same room was a collection of ocarinas, which he told me were amongst the oldest known instruments, specimens having been found at Babylon, Nineveh, and in Malaya. Alongside the ocarinas was a specimen of the latest kind of flute, invented by a Florentine (I afterwards heard it played by a good performer), and then came M. Victor Mahillon's reproduction of one of the flutes found at Pompeii. Herr Kraus arranged its holes for me to blow the enharmonic scale, and the quarter-tone was very distinct.

The second room contained a large collection of harpsichords and spinets. In the third room were other keyed instruments, including a good clavichord, while Nubian and Abyssinian instruments hung on the walls. The fourth room was very large, and contained instruments arranged in such an order as to represent the history of the pianoforte; in this is contained a pianoforte by Christofori of Florence (1722), with the repetition action, afterwards re-invented by Broadwood and Erard. Numberless viole d'amour, viola da Gamba, and other string instruments hung on the walls, and there were also two organs. The first was an Umbrian instrument of the last century. Its stops did not draw out, but were shifted sideways and held by notches.

This organ contained a very powerful reed stop, the pipes of which were right in front of the performer's face. There were a few pedals for the left foot, which projected but a few inches from the case, and could only be used by the toe. Of course legato playing was impossible. The other organ he described as modern Tuscan. It had one small keyboard and an octave of very short pedals, at such a distance apart that one had to hunt for each before playing it. Both these organs have blinds in front, which are drawn up before playing. This, by the way, is peculiar to nearly all Italian church organs. There were also in this room some finely illuminated MS. church books.

The fifth room contained Japanese and Chinese instruments, and the sixth trumpets and other wind instruments. In the passage were many curious old books relating to music; and in all the rooms there were valuable paintings. Having thanked my host, I departed, very well pleased with my visit.

On leaving Florence I went to Pisa. Here I entered the beautiful little Cathedral as Vespers were in progress, and the noise caused by the choir and organ was horrible as usual. In the evening I went to the opera. It was Rossini's "Barber of Seville." The theatre is a fair-sized one, with five rows of boxes and twenty-four in each row. I had a place in the first row of stalls, just in front of the first violins, but changed it later, as the orchestra was too noisy. There was no partition between the stalls and the band, who played in great coats—checks, or brown, or any other colour—and skull caps. The audience seemed perfectly indifferent to the music, and many sat with their backs to the stage. They talked the whole time, both with one another and with the orchestra, who seemed to know the music by heart. In a box I saw an old gentleman sitting with his back to the stage, reading a newspaper through the whole of the first act; then he disappeared. When any members of the orchestra had nothing to play they talked with one another or with their friends in the stalls, so that practically one heard little of the performance, which was very bad, except that it was mostly in tune. The singers seemed quite indifferent as to the execution of the difficult passages, but the high notes were sustained until the audience began to applaud, which they did as a matter of course, without necessarily stopping their reading or conversation. It was the funniest performance I ever heard. The band, like the singers, never seemed to have mastered the difficult passages, and tumbled along somehow, getting in together at the finish as a rule, and stopping their conversation for a moment when a more than usually complicated passage occurred. One thing amused me immensely. The conductor had to beat time on his desk so often, in order to keep his forces together, that he had a small sheet of copper fastened on it to save wearing it out! And though he struck this at the first beat of every bar in the opera, it caused the audience no annoyance; for the noise of conversation was so great that no one noticed a minor detail of this kind.

The only energetic person was the Saxhorn player; he was most objectionable, for he made it his business to drown the orchestra, singers, and audience whenever he got a chance. I found him a great nuisance till I moved farther back. After a long, and quite unnecessary flute solo, there were shouts of "bis," "bis"; but as there were counter shouts of "basta," "basta," we were spared having the thing over again.

Another peculiarity of the audience is that they sing the airs with the performers, and say their jokes with them.

Pisa contains several piano organs and many accordions; also 1,000 beggars and 500 guides, who give the unfortunate traveller no peace.

At Naples, which has the evil reputation of being the noisiest city in Europe after London, I had rooms in a house at Posilipo, outside the town and on the seashore, overlooking Vesuvius. The situation was not only in itself most charming and fascinating, but was perfectly quiet. The attractions of Pompeii, Herculaneum, the Lake of Avernus, Cumæ, Pæstum, &c., were so great that I heard very little music at Naples during my three weeks' stay there, and devoted my attention almost entirely to antiquities. The opera season had not commenced, and I visited no church except our own.

In the Naples Museum I was shown the first of the papyri discovered at Herculaneum. It is a Greek treatise on music by one Philodemus, a contemporary of Cicero, but of no great value from a musical point of view. A Latin translation has been made, from which I casually jotted down the following extract: "Those who are learned extol music with one accord as a means of education for boys; while those who are unlearned abuse it and prohibit it in their gatherings."

A large number of bronze musical instruments

found at Pompeii and Herculaneum are preserved in the museum; among them are several cornua or horns, four auloi or flutes (oboi), an instrument which appears to be a kind of portable organ, many sistra and cymbals, some bell-mouthed flutes, &c. I was given free access to all the cases containing these things through the kindness of an English resident, whose acquaintance I made, and was able to measure and thoroughly examine them. There are also many representations of musical instruments and musical performances in the famous Pompeian frescoes.

On Sunday, February 7, I played a Voluntary on the excellent little organ of the English church, and afterwards went to hear a military band on the Chiara. The performance seemed rather effeminate and sentimental; there was too much "gush" and effusion over the somewhat poor material to suit my taste. I was taken to see the Conservatorio, where I was shown the "Archives," consisting of reminiscences and relics of famous musicians of the Neapolitan school from the time of Alessandro Scarlatti, who founded the Conservatorio in 1710. Among other relics was a spinet, formerly belonging to A. Scarlatti, in good condition; and a room is given over to the autograph scores of Italian composers. This is kept carefully locked, but I was allowed to see its treasures. The Conservatorio building was formerly a monastery. C. F. A. W.

FROM MY STUDY.

FEW persons, I fancy, have made a more exciting début upon the stage of life than Guiseppe Tartini. This famous violinist inherited, or, at all events, possessed a wilful and erratic disposition, which had him completely at its mercy, led him through many adventures, and kept him out of his natural groove till long after young men of better balance generally find theirs. Tartini's father, a man of some position in Pirano, intended his son (born April 12, 1692) for the Church, and sent him to an ecclesiastical seminary, first in his native town, afterwards at Capo d'Istria. Giuseppe was, of course, required to study music, but neither the art nor the sacred vocation had any charms for this headstrong youth. Probably he hated restraint and longed for a more free and self-indulgent life; but be this as it may, I shall assume that he entered himself as a law student in Padua not to gratify a passionate love for the driest of earthly knowledge. He matriculated and then set himself with ardour to master fencing! The brilliant accomplishment then pursued with so much ardour in Italy completely fascinated Tartini, and in time he became so excellent a swordsman that the idea of adopting the craft as a profession was entertained. At this juncture he fell in love, and the course of his passion determined all his future career. It is, of course, absurd to censure young men for placing their affections injudiciously. Often they cannot help themselves, for at their age Love is King, and Tartini probably could not help himself when he surrendered his heart to a Cardinal's niece. In those days a young lady of that rank and relationship was a personage not lightly to be approached. Cardinals, moreover, were individuals whom it was unwise to offend. They had long arms and were not in all circumstances, as undoubtedly they should have been, wonders of Christian meekness. But when did lovers turn aside for such considerations? Tartini, at any rate, went straight on, carried off the lady from under her most eminent uncle's nose, and offered all and sundry the spectacle of a Cardinal's niece married to a loafing law student who spent most of his time in Schools of Arms. The Prince of the Church did not take apathetically this affront to his family. On the contrary, he bestirred himself in a manner so vigorous that Tartini fled from Padua, leaving, there is reason to believe, his wife behind him. At first he sought refuge in Rome, but found that city unsafe for such a fugitive as himself, and soon turned his steps towards Assisi, where he had a friend in a monastery. Becoming a lay member of the same community, Tartini spent two peaceful years studying music under the organist, and teaching himself the violin. At the same time, we are told, a great internal change took place. Under the influences of religion and his surroundings, the headstrong, quarrelsome young man became one of quiet temper, gentle and modest. He would probably have remained long in the monastery but for a new turn of events. One day, so runs the story, Tartini was playing a solo behind a curtain to some guests of the house, when the wind blew the veil aside and the performer was instantly recognised by a Paduan present. Returning home this person noised abroad his discovery and made vengeance easy for the Cardinal. But that high dignity had also undergone a transformation. His wrath had cooled down, and it is conceivable that the spectacle of a young wife deprived of her husband moved his compassion. Anyhow, Tartini was permitted to rejoin her, and to take her with him to Venice.

Acquaintance with great artists soon convinced Tartini that he himself had much to learn. Acting upon this, and leaving his wife behind him, he studied at Ancona, thence, after some time, returning to Padua as an artist worthy to stand in the high places of his calling. He was then twenty-nine years old. Tartini speedily became solo violinist in the Chapel of Antonio, whence his fame so spread that in 1723 he was invited to perform at the coronation of Charles VI. at Prague. There he became capellmeister to Count Kinsky, but only for a brief period. His heart was in his beloved Padua, whither he returned, and where he remained in spite of brilliant offers. Lord Middlesex guaranteed £3,000 if he would visit England, but the great artist said: "Although I am not rich, I have sufficient and do not want more." If great artists were always thus it would be well for them and for music. Dr. Burney, unhappily, did not reach Padua when on his famous tour while Tartini lived, or we should now be in possession of details even more interesting than those we gather from the master's friends and acquaintances. It is sad to be told by the worthy traveller and gossip that Tartini had a childless home and a shrewish wife. In his last hours he was affectionately tended by his best pupil, Nardini. His death took place February 16, 1770, and after a of Music according to the true Rules of Harmony." All his works, very few excepted, have now been consigned to the library, and to a dusty corner even there; but let us honour the ancient men who, in their day and generation, carried forward the standard of art and handed it, laurel-wreathed, to their successors.

I come now to an artist who lived in our day, whom many of us heard and some knew, and who, perhaps more than any other foreign singer resident in England, won the heart of the nation. It seems but yesterday that, as one honoured with the title of friend, I anxiously watched the course of the illness which deprived Therese Tietjens of life, and witnessed, for the purpose of immediate record, the sad and solemn scene of her funeral. Yet eighteen years have slipped away since that time—years which, it may fairly be said, had done little to dim the memory of a remarkable character and great gifts. Tietjens was born sixty-four years ago. She came of a Hungarian stock, but her parents, who were, it is said, in humble circumstances, resided at Hamburg, which city has the honour of numbering the great singer among her children. As a young girl, Therese gave indications of a musical nature, and, it soon becoming obvious that she possessed a voice of much promise, her career was determined. She had to begin under some disadvantages, but the last of these was overcome when, in 1849, she appeared as Lucrezia on the Hamburg stage. Lovers of coincidences may be interested to observe that, as with this character she made what was practically her début, so with it she quitted the scene of her labours and triumphs, twenty-eight years later. In 1856 Tietjens was singing in Vienna and had become in a measure famous on the strength of her Valentine. There she fell in with another remarkable woman—the widow of Jullien, who, till her death, was connected with opera in London, and, being a shrewd judge, exercised some influence upon managerial councils. Madame Jullien was struck with the capacity of the young Hamburger, and, on returning home, expressed her opinion to the then impresario at Her Majesty's Theatre, Benjamin Lumley. Lumley was, at that time, sorely in need of an attraction. His theatrical fortunes were, in fact, crumbling away, and he snatched at the chance of restoring them by engaging the Vienna Valentine. Tietjens came, made her début in Meyerbeer's opera, April 13, 1858, and at once found favour with the public, going on afterwards from success to success. But she could not save her manager, who, at the close of the season, gave up struggling with fate, and retired to his business as a solicitor. After him came that famous person, E. T. Smith, who about that time emerged from obscurity and flamed large in the theatrical sky. Smith knew as much about opera as of solemn funeral the city of Padua raised a statue to his memory.

Various reports have come down to us with regard to Tartini's violin playing, critics differing then as much as they do now. According to one writer, "his manner was cold, his taste wanting in noblesse, and in the true singing style," while others praise him for beauty of tone and facility of execution. It has been well said that the composer of so much fine, emotional music must have been a man of feeling, and would naturally express that feeling in performance. Many of Tartini's pupils became eminent in their profession, and cheerfully bore testimony to his merits as a teacher. Of his value as a composer we may all judge at first hand, a large number of his works being extant, though only one, "Il Trillo del Diavolo," stands conspicuously before the public. It is said that this most industrious artist left behind him, still in MS., 200 violin concertos. Tartini's contributions to musical literature were various, the most important, perhaps, being a "Treatise conic sections, but a man in his position can almost command advisers, and his staff included a gentleman who had studied for the opera stage, but loved to manage rather than be managed. I refer, of course, to Mr. Mapleson. Tietjens was engaged by Smith, and thus came in contact with his lieutenant, to whose professional fortunes the singer remained faithful ever after, spending the best part of her life, and dying in his service. Smith was but a shooting star, and soon burnt himself out. After him, the reins of government were assumed by Mr. Mapleson. Thenceforward, the history and conscientious of artists, never disappointing her public, who knew that her name on the bills was a guarantee against change of programme or apology for absence through indisposition. . . This great conscientiousness, as well as her genial sympathetic nature, endeared her to the whole nation, and though there never was a Tietjens 'fever,' her popularity steadily increased and never waned. Her kindness and generosity to young and struggling artists and to her distressed countrymen knew no bounds and became proverbial."

The loss of this fine singer and popular of Her Majesty's Theatre, and of Her Majesty's Opera, as the Mapleson enterprise came to be called, was the history of Therese Tietjens, her manager's main and constant support alike when the fates were propitious and when, as was not seldom the case, they frowned. How, from that time till death, she laboured amongst us, always with determination and energy, singing in opera and oratorio—in no matter what that was honourable—ever winning golden opinions and rising higher in public respect, the readers of this notice must well know. It has been aptly said of Tietjens by Mrs. Julian Marshall: "Perhaps the hardest worked singer who ever appeared, she was also the most faithful woman was a heavy blow to music in England, and though the vacant place has long been filled, she who once held it is ever looked back upon with admiration and respect.

SIR HENRY R. BISHOP.

SOME time ago, a friend, who is a relative of Sir Henry Bishop, kindly allowed me to peruse a manuscript volume in her possession, which proved to be an autograph "List of the Musical Compositions of Henry R. Bishop." On comparing it with the able article in Grove's "Dictionary of Music and Musicians," I found a number of discrepancies, and on making further inquiries I ascertained that the volume in question had never before been utilized for any publication. I think, therefore, it will be of value and interest to extract the principal details from this authentic source, and accordingly embody them in the present article.

Sir Henry Rowley Bishop was born on November 18, 1786, in London, and his talent for music showed itself at a very early age. He says: "The first song I remember to have had printed was entitled, 'He winna tak' the hint,' and was published in 1800 or 1801," when he would be about fifteen years of age, but he must have been precocious in other ways as well, for he states: "I was then in partnership (!) with my cousin, William Wigley, a music-seller in Spring Gardens, at the corner of the passage that leads into St. James's Park, during which time we bought of Dr. Arnold, for fifty pounds, a Ballet of Action called 'The Corsair,' performed at the Haymarket Theatre, and which we published. I also, about the same period, composed a set of six Waltzes, which were engraved and printed by one Riley, at No. 6 or 8 in the Strand; and, in the year 1801, I composed and published a characteristic piece entitled 'The Battle of Alexandria,' the idea and programme of which were furnished me by Mr. Samuel Arnold, who at that time was painting a Panorama on the same subject for exhibition at my uncle's great rooms in Spring Gardens.

"From the above Ballet of Action, 'The Corsair,' I arranged, with variations, the Hornpipe called 'Miss Menage's Hornpipe,' which was published, and of which a considerable number of copies were sold.

"When the partnership with my cousin was dissolved, I went to Mr. Panton's, at Newmarket, and do not remember to have composed anything there but the following pieces, during the years 1803 and 1804—viz., an Italian Scena, 'Al ruscelletto,' for soprano, which was never printed; a Quartet, 'Conservati fedel,' and an Italian song for a tenor voice, never published; an Overture, afterwards used for the Ballet of 'Tamerlan et Bajazet,' and part of the music for an opera, 'The Czar of Muscovy,' which was never performed nor printed. The words of this opera were by Mr. Botton, the father of Lady Thurlow."

In 1804 he wrote most of the music for a piece entitled "Angelina." "It was performed at the Margate Theatre. The principal vocal part was sustained by Miss Duncan, afterwards Mrs. Davison, and the part of a countryman in the piece was played by Gilbert, who a few years ago lost his life by the falling of the Brunswick Theatre. His son is now (1837) the dancer at Drury Lane Theatre. This piece was a sort of musical farce, and was brought out for the 'Benefit' of a Mrs. Henry. The words were by Mrs. Goldsmith, and the rest of the music by Lanza. It was never printed."

In 1805, whilst still with Mr. Panton, he became a pupil of Francesco Bianchi, and composed a Grand Sinfonia in C, which was never printed. It may here be mentioned that Bianchi was born in Cremona in 1752, and, after attaining considerable success as an operatic composer in Italy and France, came to London in 1793 as Conductor at the King's Theatre, which post he held until 1800, from which time until his death, in 1810, he principally devoted himself to teaching, and Bishop was his most celebrated pupil.
